The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD and include a bill which extends the 5-year term life insurance for First World War Veterans and the report which was filed with it.

ADJOURNMENT OVER AND LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at noon on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not, can the gentleman give us some idea of what we may expect for next week?

Mr. HALLECK. Yes; I shall be glad to do that.

It is our plan to call up House Resolution 36 on Monday, which resolution is designed to give the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries the same authority heretofore granted under resolutions heretofore passed in previous Congresses.

Then we expect to call up House Resolution 90, which is a resolution from the Rules Committee, giving to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Department the power of subpena and certain other powers, in compliance with the responsibilities devolving upon that committee in the carrying on of its functions under the Reorganization Act. It is my understanding there is no particular controversy about these two matters, and I anticipate they will be expeditiously handled on Monday.

Then it is our plan to adjourn from Monday until Wednesday. On Wednesday, two special orders have already been entered. Wednesday is the anniversary of the birthday of Abraham Lincoln and of Kosciusko. Two addresses will be made on Wednesday commemorating those occasions. It is our plan that the House meet on Thursday and then adjourn until the following Monday.

Mr. RAYBURN. No legislative business on Thursday?

Mr. HALLECK. No legislative business on Thursday.

I would like to make this additional statement, if I may: We all know that the committees are steadily working and that committee consideration and committee action is a necessary precedent to action on the floor of the House. The fact that we are not meeting every day gives the committees a better opportunity to complete their work.

I would also like to express the hope that as we go along through the entire session we will be able to determine toward the end of each week, as on this occasion, what the program will be for the following week, so that the committees can govern themselves accordingly and the individual Members can arrange their work. Of course, situations may arise from time to time where it will be necessary for us to deviate from what I may have outlined as the program for the next week, but I sincerely hope we can keep such occasions at a minimum.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I heard the gentleman's observation with respect to the committees functioning. I heard something to the effect that some of the committees of Congress have not yet organized. Does the gentleman know anything about that situation?

Mr. HALLECK. I know of no such situation. I would say I do not believe that is the situation. It may be that a committee or two has not completed its final and ultimate organization, but about that I do not know.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I wish the majority leader would look into that situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes on Wednesday next, following the special orders heretofore entered for that day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in reference to a bill he introduced today regarding the rationing of sugar.

Mrs. DOUGLAS asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a resolution passed by the General Assembly of the United Nations on political rights of women.

VETERANS' EMERGENCY HOUSING BILL

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from California?

There was no objection.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, housing is the No. 1 problem facing our Nation.

More families are homeless in Los Angeles today than after the San Francisco earthquake or the Johnstown flood.

In Los Angeles 162,000 families are estimated by the National Housing Agency to be existing in tents, garages, stores, cabins, trailers, hotel rooms, or doubled up in one-family dwellings. Over 50,000 of these families are veterans who fought in World War II so we could remain free. What shocking, indecent treatment of these thousands of veterans' families. The effects in disease, crime, misery, family break-up, discouragement, and anger are a danger to the entire community.

This is a permanent crisis as well as an immediate demand for action.

There has always been a shortage of decent housing for low-income families at a price they could afford to pay. But years of underbuilding from depression and war has left a drastic shortage for wide sections of the people, which will not get better unless decisive action is taken.

We must pass the Wagner-Ellender-Taft housing bill in this session. There are many other things we should do. But there still is going to be a no man's land in housing.

The veteran is not a buyer; he is a renter, and he can only pay from $30 to $50 a month. Millions of them are looking for rentals at that price and cannot find them because they do not exist and will not exist under any housing plan now under consideration.

I am introducing a bill today which will help meet this emergency and it will not wait.

We spent $2,200,000,000 alone for cantonments during the war between July 1, 1940, and August 31, 1945.

Do you have to go to war to get a roof over your head?

Can't you get a house when you want to raise a family?

Don't we yet know that bad housing or no housing at all is the greatest cause of divorce and juvenile delinquency in the country?

Don't we know that when the home life of a nation is threatened we strike at the very roots of our democracy?

We must move in this housing crisis which strikes at the heart of family life in America today.

I intend to fight for this bill directly or by amendment to the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill which I shall also support with all possible vigor.

Let me make it clear that my bill is no panacea for all housing ills.

It is not a substitute for the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill which passed the Senate last year. That bill is still critically necessary.

It has nothing to do with the urgency of continuing rent controls. Such controls must be continued until the supply of housing is brought into greater balance with the demand for housing.

The deficiency appropriation to finish uncompleted units of veterans' emergency housing is still vital.

We must continue to recognize that it is more important for people to have roofs over their heads than for night clubs, race tracks, and show places to be built. We must therefore continue a rigid limitation on nonresidential construction.

Priority allocations and materials controls should be reestablished and vigorously enforced with respect to any materials still in short supply.

The financial encouragement promised to builders of industrialized housing should be immediately forthcoming.

But no amount of comprehensive housing measures, of rent controls, of deficiency appropriations, of limitation of nonresidential construction, of enforcement of priority allocations, and of encouragement—as opposed to actual delivery—of prefabricated housing can escape the fact that there is a wide and growing gap in the housing demand for which no adequate provision is now being made or contemplated. I refer to the area in the housing market for veterans renting homes where the monthly charge is between $30 and $50. And remember, the Veterans' Administration tells us that 9 out of every 10 veterans are not home builders, but renters.

I need not tell you that few, if any, homes are available for rent to veterans in the $30 to $50 a month charge. It is in this field that the veterans' demand is greatest and, ironically enough, it is in this field where little, if anything, is being done by private enterprise.

What are the alternatives?

Basically there are two:

First. The Federal Government must itself undertake the construction of such homes, or Second. The Federal Government must participate in a financial method which will insure the construction of such homes.

I dismiss the former alternative as one that should be resorted to only when all other techniques have failed. I hope the time will not come when we shall be forced into direct Federal construction. Nevertheless, I feel, in all candor, compelled to admit that if all other measures fail to provide for this growing, insistent, undeniable demand, we may be forced into this alternative. My bill should make it unnecessary to resort to the alternative of direct Federal construction.

In brief, what the bill does is to authorize the Federal Government to make loans of $1,000,000,000 to local public-housing agencies at a 2½-percent interest rate and for terms extending up to 60 years. To help bridge the gap between the moderate rentals which would have to be charged for the new homes and the operating expenses—including the debt service—the Federal Government would make annual contributions up to 2 percent of the project's development cost. This would mean that with a building program of $1,000,000,000 worth of veterans' housing there will be a maximum annual cost to the Government of $20,000,000. This cost cannot continue over a longer period than 10 years. If we relieve our acute housing shortage quickly the contributions may be needed for only a few years.

Here is what the bill would do:

First. It would provide housing immediately for a large number of veterans requiring moderate-rental housing—which is the largest group of veterans.

Second. It would avoid recourse to direct Federal construction.

Third. It would be applicable only where the President finds that an acute shortage of housing exists which cannot be provided in sufficient quantities by private enterprise.

Fourth. It would confine its benefits to servicemen, veterans and their families, and the families of deceased persons who served in the armed forces.

Fifth. It would be restricted to rental housing.

Sixth. It would use the existing instrumentalities of public housing agencies which, over the past few years, have demonstrated, by their competence, experience, and talent, their capacity to undertake such a program.

Seventh. Because of the low interest rate on the loans and the long amortization period, it would make necessary only small annual contributions to achieve the moderate rents desired.

Eighth. When the President determines that the acute shortage of housing no longer exists, it would require the local public housing agency to dispose of any housing project constructed under this bill.

Ninth. It calls for the utilization of the Federal agency which is accustomed and experienced in this type of Federal aid to localities and therefore one which is geared in personnel and techniques to move immediately.

This measure, as I have said before, is not a substitute for the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill. That bill as it passed the Senate last year, desirable as it is, does not contain adequate provisions for the group which would benefit under my bill.

I introduce and intend vigorously to push my bill not because it is a substitute for the General Housing Act but because it is a necessary supplement to meet the insistent demands of the veterans who need homes now.

Veterans' Emergency Housing Bill

A bill to assist in the immediate alleviation of the critical shortage of moderate-rental housing for veterans, to expedite the orderly demobilization of the war effort, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That, in order to provide immediately housing at moderate rentals for veterans and servicemen and their families where such housing is not being built by private enterprise, and to supplement the provisions of the General Housing Act (this act not being in any way a substitute for such act or any part thereof), the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended by adding title I after the enacting clause and by adding the following new title II:

TITLE II. MODERATE-RENTAL HOUSING FOR VETERANS

SEC. 201. In those areas or localities where the President shall find that an acute shortage of housing exists or impends and that, because of increased construction costs, permanent housing at moderate rentals cannot be provided in sufficient quantities when needed, the Authority is hereby authorized to exercise all the powers specified in the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, together with the additional powers provided herein, to provide housing for veterans and servicemen and their families, who are unable to obtain decent housing facilities at moderate rentals within their ability to pay (as determined by the public-housing agency with the concurrence of the Authority): Provided, That any housing constructed under the provisions of this title shall be undertaken as provided herein only where the need for moderate-rental housing cannot be met by private enterprise.

SEC. 202. In recognition that there should be local determination of the need for moderate-rental housing, the Authority shall not make any contract for financial assistance under this title with respect to any housing unless the public-housing agency has submitted an analysis of the local housing market demonstrating to the satisfaction of the Authority that there is a need for such housing which cannot be met by private enterprise; and unless the governing body of the locality involved has approved the provision of such housing.

SEC. 203. The Authority shall not make any contract for financial assistance pursuant to this title with respect to any housing unless the public housing agency involved agrees:

(1) To fix fair rentals for such housing (which shall be subject to approval by the Authority) within the financial reach of veterans and servicemen and their families.

(2) To make such housing available solely to families whose net income at the time of admission does not exceed six times the rental (including the value or cost to them of heat, light, water, and cooking fuel) of the dwellings to be furnished such families.

(3) To select as tenants veterans and servicemen and their families who are eligible for occupancy under the provisions of this title.

(4) To undertake a program hereunder which will provide housing for the families of veterans and servicemen of different races, colors, and creeds in a volume which will not discriminate against meeting the needs of any such veterans or servicemen.

(5) That upon the determination by the President of the termination of the acute shortage of housing in the locality, the public housing agency shall dispose, as soon as practicable, of any housing project constructed with Federal assistance pursuant to this title at no less than the fair market value of such project, and that the full proceeds of such sale shall be paid to the Authority, such payment to constitute a satisfaction of the balance of any outstanding loan made by the Government.

SEC. 204. The term "veterans" shall include any person who has served in the military or naval forces of the United States during World War II and who has been discharged or released therefrom under conditions other than dishonorable, and the term "servicemen" shall include any person who is serving in the military or naval forces of the United States. The terms "veterans" and "servicemen" shall also include persons who died while serving in the armed forces of the United States in order to provide housing for their families.

SEC. 205. The term "moderate rental" shall mean rentals which (as determined by the public housing agency, with the concurrence of the Authority) are below the level at which private enterprise is currently building a substantial volume of decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings in the locality involved: Provided, That in no event shall such rental exceed $50 per month, exclusive of charges for utility services.

SEC. 206. (a) The Authority may make loans to public housing agencies under this title to finance the provision of moderate-rental housing for veterans and servicemen and their families. Such loans shall not exceed the cost of such housing, shall bear interest at such rate not less than the applicable going Federal rate, shall be secured in such manner, and shall be repaid within such period not exceeding 60 years from the date of the bonds evidencing the loan, as may be deemed advisable by the Authority.

(b) To obtain funds for the loan purposes of this title, the Authority may issue and have outstanding at any one time, obligations in an amount not to exceed $1,000,000,000 in addition to the amount of such bonds heretofore authorized.

SEC. 207. (a) The Authority may make annual contributions to public-housing agencies to assist them in making moderate-rental housing available for veterans and servicemen and their families. The Authority shall embody the provisions for such annual contributions in a contract guaranteeing their payment over a fixed period of years. In no case shall any contract under this title be made for a period exceeding 10 years from the date the first annual contribution is paid. Annual contributions shall be strictly limited to the amounts and periods necessary in the determination of the Authority to assure that the housing will accomplish the purpose of this title: Provided, That the fixed contribution payable annually under any contract shall in no case exceed a sum equal to 2 percent upon the development cost of the housing project involved.

(b) For the purposes of this title the Authority is authorized on and after the date of enactment of this title, to enter into contracts which provide for annual contributions aggregating not more than $20,000,000 per annum.

SEC. 208. Financial assistance in the form of loans or annual contributions under this title shall be distributed among the various States with due consideration to the relative number of veterans and servicemen and their families in need of decent housing in each State and with not more than 10 percent of the loan or annual contribution assistance available under this title being extended to any one State.

SEC. 209. The United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended by deleting the words "this section" where they appear in section 10 (d) and (e) and substituting in each instance the words "title I and title II of this act." Except as otherwise specifically provided, the provisions of title I of this act shall apply to this title II: Provided, That the provisions of sections 2 (1) and (2), 9, 10 (a), (b), and (c), 11, 12, and 15, and any other provisions of title I inconsistent herewith, shall not so apply.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentlewoman from California has expired.

VETERANS' HOUSING

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, this administration which was successful in providing veterans for foxholes has not been successful in providing these same veterans with houses. If, as Mr. Ickes said—and he should know—"Wars are the result of stupid statesmanship," it is fair to add the consequences of war, such as high taxes, inflation, and lack of shelter, result from the same original stupidity.

SENATE

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1947

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Forgive us, O God, for all our boasting and our presumptuous sins of pride and arrogance, for these are days that humble us.

By Thy grace, we become more and more aware of our limitations and our weaknesses.

Let us not mistake humility for an inferiority complex, but help us to understand that with the proud and the self-sufficient Thou canst do nothing until Thou hast brought them to their knees.

We need Thy help, our Father, and we seek it humbly. We want to do right, and to be right; so start us in the right way, for Thou knowest that we are very hard to turn. Shed forth Thy grace upon us, O Lord, that each man here may say, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." We ask it in His name. Amen.

INCREASE OF SUGAR SUPPLY FOR DOMESTIC CONSUMPTION

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, for the past month I have been trying to find some way whereby more sugar could be made available to the American people without running counter to our international obligations and interests. On January 10, I addressed a letter to Hon. William L. Clayton, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, in which I cited certain figures which indicated the possibility that more sugar might be available in the coming year. I have recently received a reply to my letter. In his reply, Mr. Clayton points out that the prospects are for an increase in the sugar crop in the coming year.

This increase, in his own words, "would give the United States in the neighborhood of 90 pounds of sugar, raw value, per capita, or approximately 87 percent of its normal prewar usage." I may point out, Mr. President, that for the year 1946 the United States had in the neighborhood of 78 pounds of sugar, raw value, per capita. In other words, there is a possibility that there will be an increase of 12 pounds.

I ask unanimous consent that my letter to Mr. Clayton and his reply to me be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
January 10, 1947.

Hon. WILLIAM L. CLAYTON,
Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs,
State Department,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CLAYTON. I have received a great many communications from constituents who, while favoring the relief of human suffering and want in the world, nevertheless feel very strongly that an excessive amount of sugar is now being diverted from American sources for consumption by people abroad. The continuing shortage of sugar is a matter of deep concern to the American people. It is imperative that vigorous and fruitful attempts be made to insure an increased supply of sugar for the people of this country during this coming year.

I am advised that there will be a substantial increase in sugar production in those countries of continental Europe which in 1946 were included in the Combined Food Board's international sugar allocation program. According to the figures which I have seen, there will be approximately 1,600,000 tons more sugar crops produced in those countries and in the British Commonwealth than was the case during the past year.

Inasmuch as this substantial increase of over 60 percent will become available in 1947 to these European countries and to Canada, it appears obvious that these countries will receive a fair share of the total 1947 world supply without requiring as much sugar from Cuba or the United States as they received in 1946. Under these circumstances the retention of the contemplated increase of 1,400,000 tons of United States produced sugar in 1947 will help considerably in easing the present sugar shortage and should insure a more liberal distribution of sugar to the American household as well as to manufacturing and institutional users.

In view of the fact that a possible solution of the sugar shortage problem rests in our economic relationships with foreign nations, I would appreciate your considered views as to the present advisability of retaining American produced sugar for the American consumers.

Very sincerely yours,

H. C. LODGE, Jr.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 30, 1947.

MY DEAR SENATOR LODGE: Your letter of January 10 requests my views regarding the retention of all American produced sugar in 1947 to meet American requirements. I infer, from your mention of a contemplated increase of 1,400,000 tons in United States production, that you include the Cuban crop in your calculation of domestic production. It is my understanding that 1947 production in the continental United States is not expected to exceed 1946 production by more than 400,000 tons, and that the 1947 crop in Hawaii and Puerto Rico will not be more than 200,000 tons larger than that of last year. No official estimate of the Cuban crop has yet been issued, but if it should reach 5,500,000 tons, as estimated by the trade, it would be approximately a million tons larger than last year.

The Commodity Credit Corporation has contracted with the Cuban Sugar Institute for most of Cuba's exportable surplus of sugar over the past 5 years, and the present contract extends through 1947. However, this Government has never claimed the whole of the Cuban crop for its exclusive use. When quotas imposed under our Sugar Act are in effect, Cuba is permitted to supply only 28.6 percent of United States consumption. During the 5 years just prior to the outbreak of war, 1935–39, Cuba's exports to the United States averaged 1,900,000 short tons, or 65 percent of Cuba's total exports of sugar.

During the war years, largely because of a shortage of shipping, sugar which would normally have moved to European markets came to this country, and replaced to a large extent the sugar which had formerly been supplied by the Philippines. Throughout the war, sugar supplies available to the Allied Governments were shared under allocation recommendations of the Combined Food Board, and with the continuance of the sugar shortage into the postwar period, it has been necessary to continue to allocate sugar. The International Emergency Food Council, successor to the Combined Food Board, anticipates the continuance of a serious sugar shortage until 1947 crops are harvested, and expects to recommend allocations of sugar through the calendar year 1947.

You speak, in your lettter, of an anticipated increase of approximately 1,600,000 tons in the sugar production of the British Empire and those countries of continental Europe which received sugar allocations in 1946. Estimates of 1946–47 production published in the Department of Agriculture's December 16 issue of Foreign Crops and Markets indicate an increase of only 907,000 tons for these countries, as shown in the following tabulation:

Estimated production of sugar

[Thousand tons]

	1945–46	1946–47	Increase
United Kingdom	630	641
Canada	85	90
France	508	735
Belgium	154	220
Netherlands	66	231
Yugoslavia	38	75
Italy	21	293
Austria	20	50
Switzerland	31	27
Finland	6	6
Total	1,559	2,368	809
British West Indies	701	725
Australia and Fiji	778	757
Mauritius	145	300
South Africa	553	480
Total	2,177	2,262	85
French West Indies	66	69
Réunion	25	35
Total	91	104	13
Grand total	3,827	4,734	907

For Europe as a whole, sugar production in 1946–47 is estimated at 7,400,000 tons, compared with a wartime low of 5,500,000 tons in 1945–46. This is still 3,000,000 tons below the 1935–39 average of 10,400,000 tons, and much of the anticipated increase will be in countries where consumption has been at such extremely low levels since the war that none will be available for export. Italian production, for example, shows an increase of 275,000 tons, but since Italy was allocated only enough sugar in 1946 to permit a consumption of 14 pounds per capita, or 41 percent of prewar usage, all of this year's production increase will be required to bring Italian consumption into line with that of other producing countries. Approximately half of the expected increase will occur in countries such as Russia, Germany, Spain, Hungary, and Poland, which have received no allocations from the IEFC, or only such small quantities as were allocated to the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. The quantity of sugar available to importing countries is, therefore, still far below requirements. If the United States were to take for domestic consumption all of Cuba's exportable surplus, it would give this country approximately 8,100,000 tons of sugar, assuming a crop of 5,500,000 tons in Cuba, 1,960,000 tons of which would come from domestic production, 1,694,000 from the island territories, and 4,455,000 from Cuba. This would be 120 percent of our average prewar consumption. Supplies available to the other importing countries of the IEFC would amount to only about 3,800,000 tons, or 57 percent of their prewar consumption of 6,600,000 tons. I do not believe that such a distribution would be regarded as equitable by other members of the International Emergency Food Council.

I should like to make clear that we purchased the Cuban crop not only on our own behalf but on behalf of other members of the United Nations. The Cuban crop represents a major portion of the world's supply of exportable sugar. Other deficit countries stayed out of the Cuban market on the understanding that all sugar procured in Cuba under our exclusive purchase contract would be subject to allocation by the IEFC. While there is no doubt that the United States has a legal claim to all of the sugar which it purchases, a decision to reserve the full quantity, or even a disproportionately large share, for domestic consumption would be regarded by other importing countries as a breach of good faith on the part of this Government.

If the Cuban crop reaches 5,500,000 tons, the exportable surplus will be about 4,500,000 tons, of which we might reasonably expect to retain two-thirds. This would give the United States in the neighborhood of 90 pounds of sugar, raw value, per capita, or approximately 87 percent of its normal prewar usage, and at the same time permit most of the countries of continental Europe to raise their consumption to about 70 percent of their low prewar levels. Such a division would correspond roughly to the prewar distribution of the Cuban crop between the United States and other foreign countries, and although it would permit a considerably higher consumption rate here than in most other importing countries, I believe that it might be acceptable to other members of the IEFC.

If stocks which have been reported to exist in Java should become available for allocation this year the quantities allocated to European claimants out of Cuba could be replaced by Javanese sugar, and the allocation to the United States proportionately increased. I do not think we should assume at this time, however, that any large proportion of the requirements of foreign claimants can be met from this source.

Sincerely yours,

W. L. CLAYTON,
Under Secretary for Economic Affairs.

MR. LILIENTHAL'S CREED OF DEMOCRACY

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a few days ago in a hearing before the appropriate Senate committee, Mr. David E. Lilienthal uttered certain words which, in my estimation, should and will become immortal in American literature. I ask unanimous consent to have published in the body of the RECORD a portion of his testimony as printed in the Washington Star of night before last in which he discusses his conceptions and understandings of the relationship between democracy and the individual. I would that every school child in America might study that great statement even as the Gettysburg Address is studied.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LILIENTHAL STATES HIS CREED AS A DEMOCRATIC AMERICAN

(David E. Lilienthal, nominated to be Chairman of this country's Atomic Energy Commission, yesterday gave the Senate Atomic Energy Committee his views of democracy in a fervent statement in which he also made an unequivocal denunciation of communism. Following is the transcript of that portion of his testimony which replies to a question of Senator MCKELLAR, Democrat, of Tennessee: "What about your views on communistic doctrine?")

This I do carry in my head, Senator. I will do my best to make it clear. My convictions are not so much concerned with what I am against as what I am for; and that excludes a lot of things automatically.

Traditionally, democracy has been an affirmative doctrine rather than merely a negative one.

I believe—and I so conceive the Constitution of the United States to rest upon—as does religion—the fundamental proposition of the integrity of the individual; and that all government and all private institutions must be designed to promote and to protect and defend the integrity and the dignity of the individual; that that is the essential meaning of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, as it is essentially the meaning of religion.

BASIC UNIT OF COMMUNISM

Any form of the government, therefore, and any other institutions which make men means rather than ends; which exalt the state or any other institutions above the importance of men, which place arbitrary power over men as a fundamental tenet of government or any other institutions, are contrary to that conception, and therefore I am deeply opposed to them.

The communistic philosophy as well as the communistic form of government fall within this category, for their fundamental tenet is quite to the contrary. The fundamental tenet of communism is that the state is an end in itself and that, therefore, the powers which the state exercise over the individual are without any ethical standard to limit them.

That I deeply disbelieve.

It is very easy simply to say one is not a Communist. And, of course, if my record requires me to state that very affirmatively, then it is a great disappointment to me. It is very easy to talk about being against communism. It is equally important to believe those things which provide a satisfying and effective alternative. Democracy is that satisfying affirmative alternative.

Its hope in the world is that it is an affirmative belief, rather than being simply a belief against something else and nothing more.

One of the tenets of democracy that grow out of this central core of a belief that the individual comes first, that all men are the children of God, and their personalities are therefore sacred, carries with it a great belief in civil liberties and their protection, and a repugnance to anyone who would steal from a human being that which is most precious to him—his good name—either by impugning things to him by innuendo or by insinuations. And it is especially an unhappy circumstance that occasionally that is done in the name of democracy. This I think can tear our country apart and destroy it if we carry it further.

I deeply believe in the capacity of democracy to surmount any trials that may lie ahead, provided only we practice it in our daily lives. And among the things we must practice is that while we seek fervently to ferret out the subversive and antidemocratic forces in the country, we do not at the same time, by hysteria, by resort to innuendo, and smears, and other unfortunate tactics, besmirch the very cause that we believe in, and cause a separation among our people, cause one group and one individual to hate another based on mere attacks, mere unsubstantiated attacks upon their loyalty.

I want also to add that part of my conviction is based on my training as an Anglo-American common lawyer. It is the very basis and the great heritage of the English peoples to this country which we have maintained, that the strictest rules of credibility of witnesses and of the avoidance of hearsay and gossip shall be excluded in courts of justice.

And that, too, is an essential of our democracy. And whether by administrative agencies acting arbitrarily against business organizations, or whether by investigating activities of the legislative branches, whenever those principles of the protection of an individual and his good name against besmirchment by gossip, hearsay, and the statements of witnesses who are not subject to cross-examination, then, too, we have failed in carrying forward our ideals in respect to democracy. That I deeply believe.

(Senator MCMAHON, Democrat, of Connecticut. Mr. Lilienthal, I want to congratulate you on that statement as a statement of, in my opinion, a very real American.)

Mr. Lilienthal later: There are always witch hunters and people who will gladly defame and assassinate the character of others without responsibility. That is why we have a system of law. And that is why we have courts, and that is why we have rules of evidence. I will be very glad to be lynched if, in the process of that lynching, this lesson about what our history means is learned, and what the history of the common law means in the terms of protection of the individual citizen against irresponsible charges of witch hunters.

PERSONAL STATEMENT

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, at the session of the Senate on last Wednesday, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], according to the RECORD, made this statement:

During the past week, Republican Senators HICKENLOOPER, KNOWLAND, and VANDENBERG insisted, in hearings on the confirmation of the Atomic Energy Commissioners, that the military be allowed to sit in on every session of the Commission in such a way that it would virtually become an integral part of the Commission. Their insistence suggests the reversal of the decision duly made by the President and the Congress that, true to the traditions of our Government, the civil authority shall always be superior to the military.

Mr. President, I do not speak in behalf of the other two Senators, who are perfectly able to speak for themselves, but, in the interest of accuracy I may say that that statement with regard to me has no foundation in fact, and the record does not bear it out in any scintilla.

I may also say that it is my definite impression that neither the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] who was mentioned in the statement, nor the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who was likewise mentioned, gave any such final implication in their questioning or in their attitude.

I may say further that I have always supported the civilian control of atomic energy. I shall continue to support the civilian control of atomic energy. I make this statement in the interest of accuracy and truth.

REMOVAL OF CONTROLS ON SUGAR

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and to have printed in the RECORD, Senate Joint Resolution No. 4 adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Illinois relating to the removal of all controls on sugar used for home consumption and for industrial purposes.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 4

Whereas the housewives of America have patiently and patriotically exercised during the period of hostilities and for more than a year since the cessation of hostilities, the strictest economy in the use and consumption of sugar as a part of their contribution to the war effort; and

Whereas sugar is indispensable for a well-balanced American diet, and housewives cannot prepare satisfactory meals without an adequate supply of sugar; and

Whereas the waste resulting from the lack of sufficient means of preserving foodstuffs through the scarcity of canning sugar can no longer be justified, since this Nation has not been at war for the past 18 months; and

Whereas Illinois, in common with other great agricultural States, produces many crops which require sugar for preservation, such as fruits, berries, and vegetables; and

Whereas in the past year losses in these products, because of the limited sugar available, have been estimated at several millions of dollars; and

Whereas the absence of sugar for canning purposes has caused thousands of tons of fruit to spoil, thereby depriving American families of a much-needed food, and has caused hardships and financial losses in many farming and canning communities; and

Whereas labor in the food-processing industry has been without work because of the sugar shortage; and

Whereas in 1946 the sugar under the direct control of the United States increased by more than one-half million tons and no portion of this increase was made available to the American people: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Sixty-fifth General Assembly of the State of Illinois, (the House of Representatives concurring herein), That the Congress of the United States of America is hereby requested to provide by law for an immediate decontrol of sugar for home consumption, and for industrial use; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress is requested to remove all control from the production, processing, distribution, rationing, sale, and importation of sugar without further delay; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent by the secretary of state to each of the Representatives in the Congress of the United States from the State of Illinois, and to each of the United States Senators from Illinois, and to the President of the United States.

Adopted by the senate, January 13, 1947.

HUGH W. CROSS,
President of the Senate.
EDWARD H. ALEXANDER,
Secretary of the Senate.

Concurred in by the house of representatives, January 28, 1947.

HUGH GREEN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
FRED W. RUEGG,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

SCHICK GENERAL HOSPITAL, CLINTON, IOWA

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and to have printed in the RECORD House Resolution No. 23, adopted by the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, relating to the restoration of Schick General Hospital, Clinton, Iowa, as a medical institution devoted to assistance of the Nation's war veterans.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House Resolution 23

Whereas numerous war veterans residing in eastern Iowa and western Illinois are urgently in need of hospitalization; and

Whereas the facilities of the hospitals which the Veterans' Administration now maintains at Hines, Ill., and Des Moines, Iowa, are barely able to take care of applicants from the Chicago and Des Moines areas; and

Whereas there now exists in the city of Clinton, Iowa, a group of buildings which during the war were used as Schick General Hospital; and

Whereas these buildings are admirably equipped to house a modern veterans' hospital; and

Whereas the United States Veterans' Administration has been deaf to the plea that Schick General Hospital be reconverted into a veterans' hospital and has persisted in its policy of building new hospitals in localities where the need is not nearly so great; and

Whereas the Veterans' Administration has advanced no sound reasons for its failure to remedy this unfortunate situation: Therefore be it

Resolved, by the House of Representatives of the Sixty-fifth General Assembly of the State of Illinois, That we urge the Congress of the United States to take such immediate action as will cause the Veterans' Administration to reverse its present position and that will insure the prompt restoration of Schick General Hospital as a medical institution devoted to assistance of the Nation's war veterans; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be prepared and forwarded by the secretary of state to the President of the United States, Gen. Omar Bradley, the Honorable SCOTT LUCAS, the Honorable C. WAYLAND BROOKS, and to the 26 Representatives of the State of Illinois in the Eightieth Congress of the United States.

Adopted by the house of representatives, January 28, 1947.

HUGH GREEN,
Speaker of the House.
FRED W. RUEGG,
Clerk of the House.

REDUCTION OF FEDERAL EXPENDITURES AND TAXES

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter I have received from Mr. and Mrs. Edward N. Harsha, of Topeka, urging the elimination of unnecessary employees and reduction of superfluous expenditures. I am receiving many letters like this.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TOPEKA, KANS., February 1, 1947.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CAPPER: According to newspaper and radio reports there seems to be a decided weakening of the Republican position in regard to elimination of unnecessary employees and reduction of the superfluous expenses in order that a real saving may be made in our Government expenditures. We hope that you will use your good offices in securing real economy in our spending to the end of reducing our terrific national debt and reduce our taxes at least 20 percent, as promised in the recent election. Of course, we take it for granted that the Congress will balance the budget, as it is our faith in the Republican Party to accomplish both economy and financial stability.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. and Mrs. E. N. HARSHA.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, at the instance of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], chairman of the Committee on Finance, and in his name, I report favorably without amendment the following bills:

S. 132. A bill to relieve collectors of customs of liability for failure to collect certain special tonnage duties and light money, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 20);

H. R. 1030. A bill to continue in effect certain war excise-tax rates, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 21); and

H. R. 1353. A bill to amend the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended (Rept. No. 22).

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reports will be received, and the bills will be placed on the calendar.

REPORT ON INVESTIGATION OF INTERNATIONAL COMMUNICATIONS BY WIRE AND RADIO (S. REPT. NO. 19)

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I have today filed a report on the investigation of international communications by wire and radio. In compliance with the Reorganization Act, which contemplates the cessation of special committees, the report officially winds up the work of a special subcommittee authorized by the Senate 3 years ago. The study of international communications, however, will continue by the new Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce as one of its multiple functions.

The report makes several points and recommendations which I desire briefly to call to the attention of the Senate.

In the first place, it recommends that legislation be enacted either removing the present requirement that the Western Union Co. dispose of its cables or provide for permissive consolidation of international communication companies, so that the Western Union cables may be taken over by such a consolidation.

I should like to explain to the Senate that when the Congress enacted the legislation under which the Postal Telegraph Co. and the Western Union Telegraph Co. were merged it was provided that the merged carrier must divest itself of international operations. In the case of Western Union it meant the divesting of that company's trans-Atlantic cables. As a result, the company has been conducting its international communications from year to year by permission of the Federal Communications Commission.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Chair may interrupt the Senator at this point, the regular order has been called for by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], and, in the opinion of the Chair, under the rule, general discussion of the committee report would not be in order in the morning hour.

Mr. McFARLAND. I understood I could discuss the matter for 5 minutes, and I would certainly conclude within that time.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The 5-minute rule applies only when the calendar is being considered.

Mr. McFARLAND. Very well.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Arizona be permitted to conclude his remarks, inasmuch as he has already begun them.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator may continue.

Mr. McFARLAND. I thank the Senator from Kentucky.

The requirement placed on the Western Union to which I have just adverted has worked a hardship upon that company, for the reason that it could not plan ahead. It does not know whether to proceed and expand its international business and go out after business; it does not know what it can do. It cannot sell its cables, because under the existing situation of uncertainty as to policy there is no customer for them. Meanwhile it is under a legal compulsion to divest itself of its cable business. So this carrier is in the situation I have described, and Congress should do something about it.

The second point is the necessity for legislation removing the present requirement of a 20 percent below normal rate for transmission of Government telegrams. The Western Union is not alone the only private business required to render service to the Government at a discount but also the only communications company left which has to transmit communications at a lesser rate for the Government than for private enterprise. This entails a hardship to the Western Union, which has been experiencing difficult problems. It has competition from the subsidized air mail, and competition from the telephone companies. Last year the Congress removed the special land-grant rate for the railroads, and several years ago the committee recommended that the differential which affects the Western Union Co. be removed. The legislation which permitted the domestic merger provided for the removal of the special rate for Government, but the provision was eliminated in the other House. I personally feel that the financial condition of the Western Union at this time demands that this differential be removed.

A third point which I should like to call to the attention of the Senate relates to what has taken place since the end of the war to the airway communications system, and the superb world-wide communications system generally built up by the Army and the Navy. The report treats of this matter in some detail. I had hoped, and many other members of our committee had hoped, that the Federal Government would establish a policy whereby these communications systems, or a part of them, the part that is not needed for the Army or the Navy, might be utilized by a private company or companies. The fact that our Government has not established an over-all permanent international communications policy has permitted these magnificent communications systems, which, I reiterate, were the best in the world, to disintegrate. It is nothing uncommon to find equipment, valued at several thousand dollars, in China or north Africa being used for a table in a hut, for instance. We turned over much of our communications equipment, as we did other equipment, to foreign governments and what was not turned over was stolen.

I call the attention of the Senate to the recommendation made by the committee that a permanent policy on international communications be established by our Government.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report be printed in the RECORD following my remarks, as a part of my remarks.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the report (S. Rept. 19) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The investigation of international communications by wire and radio was initially authorized by Senate Resolution 187 of the Seventy-eighth Congress, agreed to on October 19, 1943, which directed the then Committee on Interstate Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, to carry on such a study and make reports to the Senate. A subcommittee, consisting of Senators Wheeler, Hill, McFarland, White, and Austin, was appointed, under whose authority a staff began to gather pertinent data. The study was continued under authority of Senate Resolution 268 of the Seventy-eighth Congress and Senate Resolution 24 of the Seventy-ninth Congress, and membership of the subcommittee was revised and enlarged to include Senators Wheeler, Johnson of Colorado, McFarland, Briggs, White, Austin, Hawkes, and Capehart.

On July 31 (legislative day, July 29), 1946, the committee filed a report (S. Rept. No. 1907) which detailed work that had been done to that time, calling attention to extensive hearings that had been held, the fact that some members of the subcommittee had made on-the-spot surveys of military and nonmilitary communications in Europe, the Near East, and northern Africa, and recommended the adoption by the Government, acting through the State Department, of a comprehensive, over-all Government communications policy as a necessary prerequisite to the formulation of legislation. It is recommended that Senate Report No. 1907 be read in conjunction with this report.

The responsibilities of the Congress, and its cognizant committees, with respect to this international communications problem of the United States is by no means concluded. On the contrary, the end of the war has served only to aggravate the basic problems and they have become complicated by the intrusion of such directly connected communications matters as those involving navigational aids to aviation, in itself a major problem of tremendous proportions if world-wide aviation commerce is to make progress. But the reorganization of Senate committees and the expiration of the authority of the Senate resolution under which your committee carried on this study makes it desirable that the committee file a concluding report with the Senate, summarizing what it has done and detailing such conclusions as are proper at this time.

The committee deems it important to add that neither the filing of this report nor the expiration of the authority of the subcommittee under the Senate resolution means that the problem is solved or the study concluded. It merely signalizes the taking over of this entire problem by the committee as part of its enlarged function.

As a prelude to its report, the committee desires to call particular attention to the following paragraphs from the interim report (S. Rept. No. 1907) submitted on July 31, 1946:

"Senate Resolution 187 was introduced by Senators Wheeler, White, and McFarland. Its introduction and the need for a study of international communications grew directly out of the enactment of the so-called Domestic Merger Act (Public Law 4, 78th Cong.). That act made possible the merger of domestic telegraph companies. During consideration of this legislation members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, who were dealing with the communications problem, became particularly concerned with the situation that faced this country in the field of international communications. The merger of domestic telegraph companies was designed to greatly strengthen and improve communications by wire and radio within the continental United States. The second phase of the problem was to find ways and means of similarly strengthening and improving the service of American communications carriers doing business throughout the world. * * *

"Because little original data was available to the committee, its staff began the task of assembling pertinent information with respect to this problem. The committee learned, during consideration of the legislation which became the Domestic Merger Act, that United States carriers in the international field operated under serious disadvantages in many foreign lands. * * * Because of the requirements that exist in many places in the world of transferring American communications to foreign carriers for ultimate delivery, messages originating within the United States are not always within the complete control of the American carrier from the point of origin to the point of delivery. Such a condition fails to afford American users of international communications the best or most satisfactory service in peacetime; in times of war such conditions are untenable for any sovereign Nation and particularly so for a Nation whose interests have become world-wide in scope.

"The committee, working in close cooperation with several executive departments of the Government on this problem, realized that no final or conclusive action could be taken during the war. While hostilities continued, temporary arrangements of many kinds to implement international communications were set up and carried on. The War Department established a far-flung system of communications which linked together military outposts and air bases all over the earth. This system, established at high cost to the American taxpayer, gave visual and concrete evidence of what a single, well integrated, closely coordinated, and effectively directed international communications enterprise could accomplish. The Navy Department added to its already extensive world-wide communications service and as a result our naval vessels and shore establishments all over the world were also effectively linked together. To these two services was added the expanded and effectively operated facilities of our own American communications carriers engaged in international traffic. It should be noted, however, that all of these services were made effective only because this Nation was engaged in a world-wide war and our allies willingly extended every aid and facility in knitting together such a world-wide communications service. The end of the war modified and changed this idyllic picture. While one international conference has been held looking to improvement in American international communications facilities, the basic problem remains unchanged.

"Following the assembling of a great deal of original data and conferences between members of the committee and representatives of the State, War, and Navy Departments (the three agencies of government most interested in and most concerned with international communications), the committee began hearings on the general subject of international communications. Those hearings covered a period of nearly a month in March and April of 1945. Nine witnesses, all representatives of Government departments, appeared before the committee to present their views and the views of their agencies and departments. These witnesses included Mr. W. L. Clayton, Assistant Secretary of State; Mr. Francis C. de Wolf, Chief of the Telecommunications Division of the Department of State; the Honorable James Forrestal, Secretary of the Navy; Rear Adm. Joseph R. Redman, Director of Naval Communications; Chairman Paul A. Porter, of the Federal Communications Commission; Maj. Gen. Harry C. Ingles, Chief Signal Officer of the War Department; Brig. Gen. H. M. McClelland, air communications officer of the Army Air Forces; and Mr. Charles I. Stanton, Deputy Administrator of the Civil Aeronautics Administration. The hearings comprise two volumes of 574 pages and together with maps, charts, tables, and other valuable exhibits afford the most current and reliable information on the subject of international communications presently available.

"It should be noted here, however, that these hearings are by no means complete nor do they represent views and opinions of all authoritative sources on this subject. The committee limited the first phase of its hearings to the representatives of the Government departments, desiring to obtain a well-rounded and over-all viewpoint from the Government agencies prior to determining for the record the viewpoints of the representatives of the American carriers in the international field. During the course of the hearings it became obvious that the affected Government departments were not of one mind with respect to the policy that should be laid down by this Government to govern American international communications. There was no disagreement over one fundamental fact—American international communications stood in need of improvement from the standpoint of better, faster, cheaper, and more comprehensive service in the interests of American commercial, diplomatic, and military needs. There was a divergence of opinion among those witnesses who testified as to how this objective could and should be accomplished.

"The lack of a concerted and unified view among the Government departments led to a decision by the committee to continue its investigation and study but to hold in temporary abeyance further hearings until such time as the executive departments had reached a definitive agreement regarding American policy on international communications. Prior to and during the hearings, the executive had constituted an interdepartmental committee to study the problem and make recommendations to the President on this subject. During the hearings the committee learned that this interdepartmental committee had failed to reach complete agreement. The committee was informed that further efforts would be made by the Government departments to arrive at a concerted view which would represent departmental policy on this subject and which would then be transmitted to the Congress for its consideration in evolving legislation affecting the entire problem."

Members of the committee, aware of the extensive, far-flung network of Army and Navy communications, were concerned with what disposition would be made of these installations and systems after the war ended. Those who had studied the situation believed that a way could be found through which these modern and expensive installations could be used to build up an American-owned world-wide communications system in peacetime. A similar belief was held in some military quarters, and it was deemed desirable that the committee see at first hand the extent and scope of American world-wide communications.

A twofold purpose governed the decision to undertake a survey: (1) To see at first hand the equipment needed for, and the operation of, an integrated world-wide communications system completely within the ownership, control, and administration of the United States; and (2) to determine what part, if any, of such an integrated modern system could be fitted into a peacetime international communications system owned and operated by citizens of this country.

In May 1945 the committee was invited by the Secretary of the Navy (Mr. Forrestal), with the approval and active assistance of the War Department, to make a survey of the military communications installations which had been established in Europe, the Near East, and north Africa. Subsequently, a member of the committee (Senator McFARLAND) had an opportunity to make similar surveys of communications installations and operations in key gateway cities within the continental United States as well as throughout the Caribbean area, Alaska, and the entire Pacific, including Hawaii, Johnston Island, Kwajalein, Guam, Tinian, Saipan, Iwo Jima; Tokyo and Japan generally; Shanghai, Tsientsin, Tsingtao, and Peiping, China; Okinawa; Manila; Darwin, Brisbane, and Sydney, Australia; New Caledonia, Fiji, and Canton Islands.

The committee believes it is important to point out that when World War II ended, the United States had under its control a world-girdling wire and radio communications system such as had theretofore been wistfully conceived only in rather imaginative plans. It was the last word in modernity, and it performed superbly under all sorts of conditions. Communication between Washington and the most remote places in India, China, Japan, Africa, the Near East, and in most of Europe was almost instantaneous and teletype conversations could be carried on with the same facility that an American manufacturing plant communicates with its branch offices in the United States. No other nation had, or has, the technique, the equipment, and the know-how to do what the United States did in building and operating that system.

Nor was this vast system valuable alone for ordinary administrative and command communications. The war brought with it an unprecedented and wholly unforeseen rapid development in world-wide aviation. American-built planes, flown by American crews, were flying the world. Personnel and cargo were being carried to every quarter of the globe. Engines and competent crews alone are not enough for scheduled air transport. Safe flying, safe for the passengers and crew, is impossible without adequate navigational aids. These include the communications to get the plane off the ground, weather information, en route information, and the means to find the destination and land there despite weather conditions. The military services, aided by the brains and know-how of the best technical experts in America, developed electronic aids which made world-wide flying reasonably safe in wartime. The United States Government built not only air fields all over the world but likewise installed every modern electronic device available to insure steady, uninterrupted flights.

Thus, at war's end, there existed two vast communications operations: one linking together widely scattered airports and making air transport between them relatively safe; the second a practical commercial communications service operated by the Army Signal Corps, serving our military and diplomatic units all over the world and capable of handling tremendous message loads. Both were built and operated at tremendous cost to the American taxpayer.

What happened to the airways communications? The Army and Navy were demobilized rapidly. Trained personnel, the most critical item which takes longest to procure, returned to civilian life. Airports into which this country had poured millions of dollars in construction were returned to the nations in whose lands they were built, frequently without agreements of any kind for their further maintenance or operation on standards comparable to wartime standards, or even any agreements at all. In some cases, after the war, American-flag-line air transports were not even granted landing privileges on airports which American brains and blood and dollars had built. Valuable communications equipment was declared surplus, stacked in surplus yards, stolen, disappeared, and not infrequently could be found serving as a table or some other household item in a Bedouin's tent in the desert. A large part of the superlative airways communications service in Europe, in north Africa, in the Near East, and particularly in the South Pacific areas, disintegrated, and the existing situation is such that qualified witnesses, for example, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, term flying in the Far East and in the Pacific hazardous or unsafe in comparison with the comparative safety of wartime. Even the transport arms of the Army and Navy are seriously hampered by the present communications situation. And while the accident rate for both commercial and military transport flying has steadily decreased in recent years, the recent upsurge in major accidents is directly traceable to a lack of, or an inadequate number and type of, communication aids to navigation.

This brief summary of the disintegration that has taken place in the communications facilities for airways is being rapidly paralleled in the magnificent communications network operated by the Army Communications Service, which coupled with the Naval Communications Service, makes possible this world-girdling communications network. Brought into being within 18 months after the outbreak of the war, it gave this country for the first time in its history the kind of communications network that is dreamed about. The brains and ability and know-how of every American communications carrier and communications equipment manufacturer went into the building and maintenance of that system. But, as in the case of airways communications, rapid demobilization of trained personnel, evacuation from bases and areas all over the world where communications equipment was installed and maintained, fiscal retrenchment, and the lessening need by the military for such a world-wide service are the principal factors in the break-up of this network of communications.

It must be remembered, as has been pointed out in earlier reports by the committee, that except for the period of the war, the United States never has had a world-wide communications service available to American patrons which insured the delivery of diplomatic, military, or commercial messages through its own services to every point of destination and at rates as low as those available to nationals of other nations. This is not the fault of American commercial carriers doing business in the international field; in equipment, methods, initiative, and all-around ability they surpass the world. For example, the British communications monopoly, Cables & Wireless, whose major installations and methods of operation the committee surveyed in such key places as London and Malta, by comparison, employs equipment and methods fully a quarter of a century behind those of the major American carriers. But the fact remains that the British combine, through Empire preferences and other arrangements, has been for years, and remains today, a world-circling communications network whose services must be employed to get messages into many, many places in the world. As a single company operating throughout the world and partly owned by the Government (recently it has been nationalized and will be wholly owned by the Government) the British Government has pushed it into a preeminent place in world-wide communications. Moreover, its users anywhere in the British Commonwealth of Nations enjoy a preferential Empire rate against which competition is difficult.

Before World War II, except for Navy ship-shore and to a more limited degree shore-shore, and except for limited Army communications within the continental United States and to certain Territorial possessions, the diplomatic, military, and commercial communications of the United States and its citizens were subject to the economic and political influences of competing governments and their agencies.

This committee had previously expressed the hope (S. Rept. No. 1907, 79th Cong.) before the disintegration of war-built communications had gone too far that the United States acting through the State Department, would have evolved and promulgated an American communications policy for the guidance of American communication companies; it had hoped that the creation of a second interdepartmental committee on communications would lead to unified agreement among the various departments and agencies of Government which have heretofore expressed conflicting opinions before this committee as to what should be American communications policy.

This committee believed that promulgation of such a policy was desirable and necessary so that our own American communications companies could be guided in their future plans, not alone with respect to competition between themselves as against foreign communication services, but likewise with respect to what American users of international communications services may expect in the way of rates and practices which directly affect the freer exchange of news and information between nations.

This committee also had hoped that even before the formulation of such a policy and while our Government still enjoyed the prestige and affection that its contribution toward winning the war had given the United States among the nations of the world, thought would have been given and action taken toward working out mutually satisfactory arrangements or temporary agreements with many foreign powers for the continued maintenance and operation in certain areas, either by us or by them, of both airways communications and commercial communications installations and service.

Unfortunately, this policy was not followed. Instead of seizing opportunities which appeared to have been available, it will now be necessary, in most cases, to begin all over again, relying on our bargaining ability in international conferences. Our record of accomplishments in such conferences in both the communication and aviation spheres has not yet been marked with outstanding success.

The committee has carried out the function assigned it by the Senate. It has surveyed extensive communications installations throughout the world. It has held hearings, which though incomplete from the standpoint of finally evolving a legislative policy, has, nevertheless, brought up to date the most authoritative body of data bearing on the subject of American international communications. In the 3¼ years since the study was authorized by the Senate, the committee has expended $14,555.16 of the $15,000 appropriated for the work, this expenditure including salaries for staff. The surveys of communications installations, the hearings, and the study generally has armed members of the committee with valuable information on the broad general subject of international communications and their importance to the diplomatic, military, and economic welfare of the Nation.

The committee deems it important to point out that the study here reported on grew out of the legislative preparation of the bill which became the Domestic Merger Act, permitting the merger of the Western Union and Postal Telegraph companies. In its original form that legislation, carrying out the recommendations of an earlier report by this committee, would have permitted a similar merger of American carriers operating in the international field, but barred the creation of a single over-all communications carrier operating both in the domestic and international fields. The provision permitting a merger of international carriers was dropped at the specific request of the Navy Department, and other agencies of Government. These agencies, faced at that time with the exigencies of defense preparations, felt they did not have the time to devote to a study of so important a problem, and asked that it be deferred until such time as their views could be worked out.

The removal of the international merger provision has worked an injustice on the Western Union Telegraph Co., the sole remaining domestic carrier which subsequently absorbed the Postal Telegraph Co. The Domestic Merger Act specifically prevented the merged domestic carrier from engaging in international business and conversely, any merged international carrier from engaging in domestic business. Because the law as finally enacted did not permit merger of international carriers, the Western Union Co. has found itself in the anomalous position of not being able to dispose of its extensive trans-Atlantic cables and has continued to operate them under special permit of the Federal Communications Commission, which has been renewed from time to time, until some final solution of the merger question is made by the Congress. It is neither a sound nor a healthy situation for a corporation to operate a phase of its business under a law which provides that it must eventually dispose of that phase of its business, but meanwhile must continue to operate it. Obviously, the corporation does not know whether it should make improvements in its cable lines, aggressively seek new business and attempt to build up its international business, or assume that eventually it must dispose of this operation and do little about it.

Meanwhile the company has faced tremendously increased operating costs, due to retroactive wage decisions and increased wages. It has been granted rate increases by the Federal Communications Commission, but its ability to carry on and furnish a first-class communications service to American users is further hampered by this legislative anomaly.

This company is likewise suffering an additional discrimination in the way of special rates for Government business. The special rate for Government messages was a requirement of the 1866 Post Roads Act, as amended, under which the company was granted certain rights-of-way over public lands. A provision which would have removed the special rate to Government was eliminated from the Domestic Merger Act when that bill was in conference. The committee, however, desires to point out that this company is the only private business in America which is required to furnish service to the Government at a lower rate than to other patrons. The Congress last year eliminated the special land-grant rates for railroad haulage of Government supplies and personnel, and no other communications carrier is required to grant the Government a special rate.

The committee believes that in fairness to the Western Union and in the interest of strengthening this domestic communications company so that it can offer a better service to American users, the Congress should (a) either eliminate from the law the provision which prevents the Western Union Co. from carrying on fully and freely its international business by cable, or expedite legislation providing for merger of international carriers so that the cables may be transferred to such a carrier, and (b) eliminate the prevailing special rate to Government as an incongruity not required of any other private business.

The committee also looks forward with a great deal of anticipation to a report on international communications which is expected from the interdepartmental committee. It recognizes that while the primary duty of laying down a legislative policy in this field devolves upon the Congress, it is of the greatest importance that the Congress have before it the views of the interested and affected Government departments and agencies, and that these views be unified, so that they represent a broad policy determination on this vitally important communications problem. The committee believes that the more than 3 years that have elapsed since this study was undertaken has afforded ample time for the Government agencies concerned to reach agreement on what should be this Nation's international communications policy. The committee itself has made clear, in earlier reports, that permissive consolidation of carriers and careful frequency allocation standards are prime legislative requisites.

The committee believes that with the cooperation and assistance of the agencies of Government concerned with the problem, a permanent solution can be and should be worked out as rapidly as possible. The committee reiterates the final paragraph of its interim report of July 31, 1946:

"The committee trusts that with the advent of the Eightieth Congress it will have the benefit of the Executive's view on American international communications policy and that the policy so presented will have the approval and support of all of the interested Government departments and agencies. With such a recommendation before the Congress, the committee is of the opinion that further hearings, during which the viewpoint of the carrier representatives will be heard, can be expedited and the Congress presented with a definitive legislative proposal which would strengthen and improve international communications service all over the world, with the object of making cheaper and more readily available American news to all other countries and their news to America; cheapening, speeding, and affording greater and more secure communications to American commercial interests and making more secure and complete American diplomatic and military communications."

NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill creating a National Science Foundation, which is similar to the bill passed by the Senate last year. I ask unanimous consent that a statement prepared by me in connection with the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill introduced by the Senator from Utah will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 525) to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, to secure the national defense, to advance the national health and welfare, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. THOMAS of Utah, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The statement presented by Mr. THOMAS of Utah was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR ELBERT D. THOMAS, OF UTAH, ON THE INTRODUCTION OF A BILL CREATING A NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION

Mr. President, in the last session of Congress the Senate passed a bill creating a National Science Foundation for the purpose of providing Federal assistance on a peacetime basis to fundamental scientific research and training. This bill which had been sponsored by Senators KILGORE, MAGNUSON, SALTONSTALL, FERGUSON, JOHNSON of Colorado, PEPPER, FULBRIGHT, and myself, embodied the results of extensive Senate study and debate, and had the endorsement of the principal educational and scientific groups of the country. Because the House failed to act on this bill the Seventy-ninth Congress did not enact much-needed comprehensive scientific legislation.

Many persons who have followed the development of science in this country and abroad believe that the Eightieth Congress should act promptly to create a National Science Foundation such as that favored by the Senate in the last session of Congress. At the annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science held in Boston this past December the representatives of the principal scientific groups of the country expressed themselves to this effect.

As the former chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee which reported this bill favorably in the last Congress and as a member of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee, which I assume will have jurisdiction over this legislation in the new Congress, I am today reintroducing this bill in the form that it passed the Senate on July 3 of last year. It is, of course, clearly understood that I do not consider the bill as now reintroduced a final document, but rather the appropriate starting point for speedy and effective consideration of legislation in the new Congress. I personally feel that support to the social sciences which was dropped from the committee bill by the Senate should be reinstated.

Many other Senators have been interested and, in fact, have worked tirelessly in perfecting this bill. In view of this fact I ask unanimous consent that other Senators may be permitted to officially join in sponsoring this bill and that their names be added upon my submitting them to the Senate. I also ask unanimous consent for a brief extension of my remarks at this point for the purpose of further describing its purposes and status.

The Senate bill—S. 1850—which in the last Congress had been perfected after many months of active study and hearings provided Federal assistance on a peacetime basis for scientific scholarships and fellowships, and for scientific research, including fundamental research generally, and applied research in health and medicine and national defense. These functions were favored by the Senate only after exhaustive evidence provided by its own Military Affairs Committee and the Office of Scientific Research and Development showed that existing Government and private arrangements could not support the needs of an advanced industrial nation like our own.

Another purpose of the bill was the creation of a central Federal scientific agency which would have general oversight over the numerous scientific activities already supported by the Federal Government. It is believed that this coordinating feature would increase the effectiveness of Federal scientific research and either yield an outright financial economy or give us better scientific work for the same money.

At the present time some of the activities contemplated by the National Science Foundation bill are being carried out on a temporary basis while other needed functions are not being met at all. The War and Navy Departments are carrying on vast programs of military research, including the support of fundamental research programs, in the amount of about $100,000,000 annually. The military departments have publicly stated, and it is generally agreed, that these fundamental research projects should be administered on a permanent basis by a civilian agency such as the proposed National Science Foundation. Scientific scholarships and fellowships, financial aid for research in health and medicine, and support for many important types of fundamental research are still not available.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], and myself, I introduce for appropriate reference a bipartisan bill covering the vitally important subject of research in the fundamental sciences.

In preparing the bill we have considered carefully the debates last year on S. 1850, and we have tried in this bill to meet the objections made to the bill passed by the Senate last year, which was rejected by the House.

We have conferred with many scientists particularly interested in this subject—and, in particular, Dr. Conant, president of Harvard University; Dr. Smyth, of Princeton, the author of the atomic-energy report; and Dr. Vannevar Bush, who was the directing head of the Office of Scientific Research and Development.

In introducing this bill, we are doing so with the feeling we are taking a right course in simplifying the procedure and in turning over the whole responsibility of this scientific-research program to a foundation of scientists who will be appointed by the President with confirmation by the Senate.

This foundation of eminent scientists is given a free hand by the bill to develop the policies of scientific research in the United States, and to discover and train promising young scientists, with financial aid from the Federal Government.

I make this brief statement in introducing the bill in order to emphasize its bipartisan character. I also desire to reemphasize that the general approach of the bill, with its emphasis on basic science as contrasted with applied science, has the approval of leading scientists of the country in the fields of both basic and applied science.

If passed, the bill will be known as the National Science Foundation Act of 1947.

The bill (S. 526) to promote the progress of science; to advance the national health, prosperity, and welfare; to secure the national defense; and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. SMITH (for himself, Mr. CORDON, Mr. REVERCOMB, Mr. SALTONSTALL, Mr. MAGNUSON, and Mr. FULBRIGHT), was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

TIME ALLOWANCES AND COMPENSATION FOR CERTAIN PRISON INMATES

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to authorize additional allowances of good time and the payment of compensation to prison inmates performing exceptionally meritorious or outstanding services. The bill has been drafted by the Attorney General of the United States, and I introduce it at his request. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD, together with a letter addressed to me from the Attorney General, dated February 5, 1947.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin will be received, and, without objection, the bill and letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 534) to authorize additional allowances of good time and the payment of compensation to prison inmates performing exceptionally meritorious or outstanding services, introduced by Mr. WILEY, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the discretion of the Attorney General and under rules and regulations promulgated by him:

(a) The additional deductions from sentences of prisoners employed in industries or camps authorized by section 8 of the act of May 27, 1930 (46 Stat. 391, 18 U. S. C. 744h), may be extended to prisoners performing exceptionally meritorious or outstanding services in institutional operations; and

(b) The Prison Industries Fund, established by section 4 of the act of June 23, 1934 (48 Stat. 1211, 18 U. S. C. 744–1), may be employed in paying compensation to such prisoners.

The letter presented by Mr. WILEY is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1947.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I desire to draw your attention to a discriminatory feature of existing law relating to the employment of Federal prisoners.

Under existing law, Federal prisoners may be compensated if they are employed in a Federal prison industry (18 U. S. C. 744f). Such prisoners may also receive reductions in their sentences for such employment (18 U. S. C. 744h). On the other hand, prisoners who are not assigned to industries but who do maintenance work in the Federal institution in which they are incarcerated receive no compensation or recognition in the way of additional time off.

Prisoners who perform meritorious or outstanding services in connection with institutional operations should be allowed, in some instances, similar advantages as are prisoners employed in industries. In many cases such prisoners are just as capable as those assigned to the various industries and contribute just as much to their own welfare and to the operations of the various institutions. Often prisoners who are expert plumbers or steamfitters, as an example, would like to be assigned to an industry but are needed in the institution and, accordingly, are assigned to it. This gives rise to a feeling of discrimination which hampers the primary purpose of employment in prisons, i. e., the rehabilitation of the prisoner.

Accordingly, I suggest that existing law be extended so as to allow, in the discretion of the Attorney General, compensation and extra time deductions to inmates employed in maintaining the various institutions on a similar basis as is extended to prisoners employed in industries. Such advantages should be granted only to a prisoner showing a real attempt to improve his ability for a useful life upon his release.

I suggest, also, that like advantages be extended to prisoners who perform acts of bravery, who protect the lives of civilian employees or other inmates, or who voluntarily accept dangerous assignments. An example of the latter group would be those prisoners who volunteered to submit to the malarial and other research experiments in an effort to aid the armed forces during World War II.

A draft of a proposed bill to effectuate the foregoing purposes is enclosed.

I have been advised by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget that the proposed legislation is in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

TOM C. CLARK,
Attorney General.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN WAR EXCISE TAX RATES—AMENDMENT

FILING OF ANNUAL STATEMENTS OF INCOME BY SENATORS—AMENDMENT

INVESTIGATION OF USE OF GOVERNMENT TIME FOR PRIVATE PUBLICATIONS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, as Chairman of the Committee on Civil Service, I wish to announce the appointment of a subcommittee, of three Senators consisting of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE], chairman; the Senator from Montana [Mr. ECTON]; and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. UMSTEAD] to make a thorough investigation as to whether employees under civil service have been employed on Government time to write autobiographies and newspaper columns, private manuscripts, books, or other documents written for profit or for personal use, during the past 6 years.

At the same time I wish to issue an invitation to any civil service employee who did that character of work for any official in the United States Government to communicate with me, and I will guarantee to protect him in his civil service status.

I wish to say further, Mr. President, that the purpose of appointing this committee is to protect the taxpayers. If it is found that any official, in the past 6 years, used Government employees during working hours, on Government pay, to further that individual's private interest, the Attorney General of the United States will be requested to institute civil action to recover the money wrongfully paid out.

THE OPENING OF BOY SCOUT WEEK

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, 37 years ago today an event occurred which few people noted and fewer still applauded, yet which was destined to affect the lives of over 13,000,000 of our citizens, and through them the lives of millions of others with whom they have associated. This event was the incorporation of the Boy Scouts of America, an organization which was granted a Federal charter by Congress 6 years later on the basis of outstanding service rendered to the Nation.

Since that day 37 years ago, more than 13,000,000 men and boys have experienced the joys and derived the benefits of Scouting. They have had the opportunity to take part in worth-while activities and to extend their horizons by contacts with Scouts in some 73 different lands, representing practically every civilized nation in the world.

Most people know that the Scout program provides wholesome recreation for boys in the out-of-doors. Not everyone understands that the Scout method of training for citizenship is unique, and that it should be a part of the experience of every American boy. Many former Scouts give evidence of the value of this training. This volunteer agency deserves the support of all the American people.

FREEDOM FROM TAX ON GIFTS TO UNITED NATIONS — COMMUNICATION FROM THE PRESIDENT

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Finance:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 6, 1947.

Hon. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
President of the Senate pro tempore,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

An offer of $8,500,000 has been made to the United Nations for acquisition of a headquarters site in the city of New York, on the condition that the gift should be free of Federal gift taxes.

The United Nations desires to take advantage of this generous offer and has requested that the United States comply with the condition attached to this gift.

I heartily recommend that this Government comply with this request. It would appear that the most desirable method by which this gift could be freed from such taxes would be to amend the appropriate sections of the Internal Revenue Code. In addition to accomplishing the purpose of complying with the above offer, the effect of such an amendment would be to encourage other public-spirited citizens to make gifts to the United Nations.

I enclose herewith for your consideration copy of a suggested joint resolution which would accomplish the desired purposes.

I consider that the passage of such a resolution is definitely in the public interest and I suggest that you bring this to the attention of the Congress at your earliest convenience.

Very sincerely yours,
HARRY S. TRUMAN.

EXTENSION OF SECOND WAR POWERS ACT RELATING TO NATURAL AND SYNTHETIC RUBBER—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

To the Congress of the United States:

In my recent message to the Congress requesting the extension of certain titles of the Second War Powers Act for continued controls in a few specific areas I pointed out the importance of natural and synthetic rubber to the national security. In that connection I urged the Congress to continue allocation controls over rubber pending consideration of permanent legislation that would insure the maintenance of a minimum synthetic-rubber industry in the United States.

I am sure that the Congress will wish to consider carefully all aspects of the problem before enacting permanent legislation. During the period of such consideration, however, I urge that there be no break in the continuity of policy and administrative action concerning both natural and synthetic rubber. I therefore wish to review, in somewhat fuller detail than was possible in my previous message, the character of this problem and to suggest actions that seem desirable for the Congress to take at this time.

The problem has not been a matter of immediate concern up to the present time, because world supplies of natural rubber have been so critically short that it has been necessary for us to make fullest practicable use of our facilities for producing synthetic rubber. As I stated in my previous message, the world supply of natural rubber is still inadequate to meet world needs. We must, however, recognize that the time is rapidly approaching when this condition will no longer prevail. According to the best evidence that I have been able to obtain, it appears that perhaps in late 1947, and almost certainly by early 1948, natural-rubber production will have increased to the point where it will be possible to satisfy world rubber needs largely from natural rubber. With an adequate world supply of natural rubber and a free choice of materials by industry, the use of synthetic rubber in the United States might fall substantially below the permanent production goals considered to be minimum for the needs of national security. This would be even more likely if at sometime in 1948 the world supply of natural rubber should begin to exceed the total world demand for all rubber.

The Congress has already made provision, by means of the Strategic and Critical Materials Stock Piling Act of 1946, for the accumulation of a stock pile of natural rubber within the borders of the United States. The physical properties of rubber, however, and the necessity of stock-pile rotation, place limits which make the largest feasible Government stock pile of natural rubber inadequate in itself to meet the demands of a national emergency. The stock pile must be supplemented by an assured production of American-made rubber.

Appropriate action should be taken now to assure that adequate facilities for the production of American-made rubber of the highest quality continue to be available. Part of this productive capacity should continue in effective operation, and the techniques required for the efficient processing of synthetic rubber in the manufacture of rubber products should be maintained and improved.

The Congress will recall the extraordinary measures that had to be taken in the early days of the recent war to meet the emergency caused by the sudden unavailability of our normal supplies of rubber. At the direction of President Roosevelt a Rubber Survey Committee was created which outlined vigorous measures to be taken by both industry and Government. We were fortunate in having time to carry out the program outlined by this committee, for the shortage of rubber could have caused the collapse of our war effort and of our domestic economy.

On another occasion we might not be so fortunate. The security of the United States and the essential needs of its citizens must never again be jeopardized by inadequate or uncertain rubber supplies.

In recognition of this fact, the Director of War Mobilization and Reconversion created an Interagency Policy Committee on Rubber in September 1945. This committee made an exhaustive study of the problem, in cooperation with industry and the executive agencies concerned, and submitted two reports which were transmitted to the Congress on March 8 and July 22, 1946. These reports outline the dimensions of the problem and suggest various methods of meeting it.

The Congress should deal with all aspects of this matter during the present session because of its vital effect upon our national security. Meanwhile, it is imperative that the Congress extend authority to continue controls over rubber under the Second War Powers Act, as I requested in my previous message. Prompt action by the Congress will provide the basis for continuity of operation in rubber controls, and will permit their simplification and orderly relaxation or removal. It will also greatly aid the agencies concerned in planning production in Government-owned synthetic rubber plants and such action will contribute to the disposal of these plants to private industry.

The time will soon arrive when it will no longer be necessary to use these controls to insure equitable distribution of natural rubber or to produce the maximum number of commodities from synthetic rubber. When this time comes, continued controls would be used only for the purpose of insuring the maintenance of a minimum synthetic-rubber industry in the United States. Controls should be used for such maintenance of a synthetic-rubber industry only if specific authority is provided for that purpose.

I therefore recommend that the Senate and the House of Representatives, by joint resolution, make a declaration of policy to the effect that it is the firm intention of the Government to maintain a synthetic-rubber industry in the United States, adequate to the minimum needs of national security.

I further recommend that the Senate and the House of Representatives act expeditiously in establishing appropriate committee arrangements to consider the problems involved in maintaining a synthetic-rubber industry in the United States and to draft such legislation as is found to be necessary to accomplish this objective.

I repeat my recent recommendation that the authority to continue allocation controls on rubber be continued for 1 year under title III of the Second War Powers Act, in order that the Congress may have an opportunity to consider this problem and to enact such permanent legislation as in its judgment is necessary and appropriate.

The program of action I have outlined has the unanimous and vigorous support of all agencies of Government concerned with this problem. I am instructing these agencies to give all possible assistance to the Congress in its consideration of the problem, and to make available, on request, the statistical material and other information which they have collected.

ESTABLISHMENT OF MAXIMUM RENTS BY ADMINISTRATOR, OFFICE OF TEMPORARY CONTROLS

Mr. BUTLER obtained the floor.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma for a short statement.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, it has been a long-standing practice for many of the executive agencies of Government to override the will of Congress by distorting the law or wholly ignoring it.

It appears that such is the case in the attempted continued establishment of maximum rents by the Administrator of the Office of Temporary Controls through the facilities of that office. At the last session of the Seventy-ninth Congress the Second War Powers Act was extended and amended expressly to provide that nothing contained in the act, or any other act, shall be construed to authorize the establishment by any officer or agency of the Government of maximum prices for any commodity or maximum rents for housing accommodations, except the officer or agency specified in the Emergency Price Control Act or the Stabilization Act.

Notwithstanding this express prohibition by the Congress, the President, by Executive order, has transferred this function to the Office of Temporary Controls, and the Administrator of that office is now asserting the right to establish maximum rents for housing accommodations. What I say in connection with this matter has nothing to do with the merits of continued Federal rent controls. My personal view is that all wartime controls should be ended promptly; but what I want to bring to the attention of the Senate is a matter I deem to be a flagrant disregard of law by the President and the personnel of an executive agency which has been set up by Executive order.

The principle involved is highly important. The Office of Price Administration was an agency set up by the Congress under the terms of the Emergency Price Control Act. The standards by which it might operate were defined in the statute by the Congress. The Administrator of that office could be appointed by the President only with the advice and consent of the Senate, and thus, control was retained over the identity of the person who was to administer the far-reaching war powers delegated by the law.

It was certainly my intention in offering the amendment to the Second War Powers Act which excluded the authority of any officer or agency of the Government to establish maximum prices or maximum rents except the officer and agency specified in the Emergency Price Control Act or the Stabilization Act, to prevent the precise thing which the President has now done by Executive order.

The Office of Temporary Controls is not a creature of the Congress. The Administrator of that office is appointed by the President without regard to the consent or advice of the Senate, and consequently the right of the Senate to exercise its participation in the selection of the individual who is now administering the wartime controls of establishing maximum prices and maximum rents has been bypassed.

Section 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act provides that each outstanding committee of the Senate and the House "shall exercise continuous watchfulness of the execution by the administrative agencies concerned of any laws the subject matter of which is within the jurisdiction of such committee."

I have sent to the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], a copy of correspondence with the Administrator of the Office of Temporary Controls, and I urge upon that committee that it investigate and consider whether the actions of the Administrator and that agency are in violation of existing law with respect to the establishment of maximum rents; and if so, take such action as they deem appropriate.

Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks copies of correspondence between me and Maj. Gen. Philip B. Fleming, and a statement by me.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 3, 1947.

Maj. Gen. PHILIP B. FLEMING,
Administrator, Office of Temporary Controls, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL: By Executive Order 9809 of December 12, 1946, the President consolidated various governmental agencies, including OPA, to form the Office of Temporary Controls and transferred the functions of such consolidated agencies to that Office. Pursuant to this action, you, as Administrator of the Office of Temporary Controls, are continuing the establishment of maximum rents for housing accommodations.

In this connection, I call your attention to section 2, title 15, of the Second War Powers Act, which provides as follows:

"Nothing contained in this act or any other act (except the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, or the Stabilization Act of 1942, as amended), shall be construed to authorize the establishment by any officer or agency of the Government of maximum prices for any commodity or maximum rents for any housing accommodations."

You will note that by the express language of the above provision of law no officer or agency of the Government is authorized to establish maximum prices for any commodity or maximum rents for any housing accommodations except as provided by the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, or the Stabilization Act of 1942, as amended.

Since the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, reposes exclusive jurisdiction in the Administrator of the Office of Price Administration to "establish such maximum rent or maximum rents for such accommodations as in his judgment will be generally fair and equitable and will effectuate the purposes of this act," it seems clear that the function of establishing maximum rents for housing accommodations cannot be transferred to or performed by the Office of Temporary Controls or the Administrator of that agency, and the President is without authority of law to direct or authorize any officer or agency of the Government to perform such function except the officer and the agency specified in the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended.

I am, therefore, requesting that you advise me what provision of law, in your opinion, authorizes you to establish maximum rents for housing accommodations. Your immediate answer in this connection will be greatly appreciated, in view of the legislation concerning rent controls now being considered by the Congress.

Yours very truly,

E. H. MOORE.

STATEMENT OF E. H. MOORE, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM OKLAHOMA

I have today written Maj. Gen. Philip B. Fleming, Administrator, Office of Temporary Controls, as per the attached letter, which is self-explanatory.

It is my opinion that the establishment of maximum rents by the Administrator of the Office of Temporary Controls is without authority of law and that his acts in this connection are illegal. When the Second War Powers Act was extended at the last session of Congress, I offered an amendment to that law which was adopted by the Congress providing that nothing in that act, or any other act, shall be construed to authorize the establishment by any officer or agency of government of maximum rents for any housing accommodations except the officer or agency named and designated by the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942.

This is important. The Emergency Price Control Act lays down express limitations for establishing maximum rents and the Administrator of the Office of Price Administration is appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Thus Congress has control over the individual who is to administer the Emergency Price Control Act. The Office of Temporary Controls is a creature of the executive department of government created by Executive order.

Its rules and regulations and methods of procedure are not limited by any specific law of Congress. The Administrator of that office is appointed by the President, and the Senate has no authority to approve or disapprove such individual. The reasons for the amendment to the Second War Powers Act above referred to are, therefore, obvious.

Establishment of maximum prices and rents were wartime emergencies. They are the essence of regimentation and will not be tolerated by the American people under our form of government except in time of war and even then only under the express provisions of law enacted by the people's representatives in the Congress.

The action of the President in transferring the functions of the Office of Price Administration to establish maximum rents for housing accommodations to the Office of Temporary Controls is directly in the face of and contrary to the Second War Powers Act, as amended at the last session of Congress. Since the Office of Price Administration has been terminated by its transfer to the Office of Temporary Controls, and since the Administrator of the Office of Price Administration, as provided by the Emergency Price Control Act, has resigned, and no Administrator has been appointed or approved by the Senate, it would appear that there has been no authority of law for the establishment of maximum rents since December 12, 1946. In ignoring the law, the President has vitiated the existing legal authority to establish maximum rents.

OFFICE OF TEMPORARY CONTROLS,
OFFICE OF PRICE ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., February 6, 1947.

Hon. E. H. MOORE,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MOORE: This is in answer to your letter of February 3, 1947, inquiring as to the authority of the Temporary Controls Administrator to establish maximum rents for housing accommodations.

The Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, authorizes the establishment of maximum rents for any housing accommodations. Under Executive Order 9809, dated December 12, 1946, the Office of Price Administration and certain other agencies, together with their functions, were consolidated to form one agency in the Office for Emergency Management of the Executive Office of the President, to be known as the Office of Temporary Controls. The order also vested in the Temporary Controls Administrator the functions of the Price Administrator.

The order is based, in part, upon title I of the First War Powers Act, 1941, which authorizes the President to redistribute functions among agencies, to consolidate agencies, and to transfer duties and powers from one agency to another.

You refer to section 2, title 15, of the Second War Powers Act, which reaffirms that the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 is the sole authority for the establishment of maximum rents for any housing accommodations. The section of the Second War Powers Act to which you refer does not—and, indeed, does not purport to—limit or restrict the power of the President to designate which officer or agency of the Government shall exercise the authority contained in the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 to establish maximum rents for any housing accommodations.

In brief, the Temporary Controls Administrator, having been vested with the functions of the Price Administrator, establishes maximum rents for any housing accommodations solely pursuant to the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended.

Sincerely yours,

PHILIP B. FLEMING,
Major General, United States Army,
Administrator.

FEBRUARY 6, 1947.

Maj. Gen. PHILIP B. FLEMING,
Administrator, Office of Temporary Controls, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL: I have yours of February 6 in answer to my letter of February 3.

It seems clear from your reply that the context of my letter was not studied in connection with existing provisions of law and that the legal issue raised was not understood by you.

I have no doubt that maximum rents are being established by the Administrator of the Office of Temporary Controls through the facilities of that Office in the manner provided for by the Emergency Price Control Act. That, however, is not the question raised and is wholly beside the point. The point is that the Congress has, by law, said that no act shall be construed to authorize any officer or agency of the Government to established maximum rents except the officer and agency provided for in the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended.

The Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, delegates permissive authority to the Administrator of the Office of Price Administration, as provided for in that act, to establish maximum rents through the facilities of and in accordance with the Office of Price Administration, as created by the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended. The Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, does not authorize the establishment by any other officer or agency of the Government of maximum rents.

You state that the amendment to the Second War Powers Act does not limit or restrict the power of the President to designate which officer or agency of the Government shall exercise the authority contained in the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 to establish maximum rents for any housing accommodations. That is exactly what it does do, namely, the amendment provides that nothing contained in the Second War Powers Act, or any other act, except as that provided in the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, shall be construed to authorize the establishment by any officer or agency of the Government of maximum rents. In other words, maximum rents may be established by the officer and agency of the Government designated and specified by the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, and no other. That was the express purpose of the legislation.

It should, therefore, be apparent to you that the Office of Temporary Controls, or the Administrator of that Office, is without authority of law to establish maximum rents for any housing accommodations, and that Executive Order 9809 of December 12, 1946, is illegal and void to the extent that it attempts to authorize such agency or its Administrator to do so, and that your continued actions in this regard are illegal and without legal force or effect, and are subject to such penalties as may be judicially determined in the premises.

Yours very truly,

E. H. MOORE.

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] has been recognized.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHITE. Is not the call of the calendar now the order of business?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call of the calendar under rule VIII is the order of business.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, a number of Senators desire to speak, most of them very briefly, but may I not urge on them that they permit the disposition of the calendar, and to defer requesting time to speak on matters not related to bills on the calendar until we have disposed of the calendar? There are only about half a dozen bills on the calendar. They can be very speedily disposed of, and then it will be in order for Senators to speak on subjects concerning which they desire to address the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I am very anxious to cooperate with the majority leader and with the Senate. I am anxious to get away from the Senate reasonably early. If by unanimous consent I may have the floor for a short time following the call of the calendar, I will yield the floor.

Mr. WHITE. That is entirely agreeable to me.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The calendar, under rule VIII, is in order. The clerk will proceed to state the measures on the calendar.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 27) to provide for suspending the enforcement of certain obligations against the operators of gold and silver mines who are forced to cease operations because of the war was announced as first in order.

Mr. WHITE. Let the bill go over.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

EASEMENT IN CERTAIN LANDS IN VIRGINIA AND MARYLAND

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 220) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to convey to American Telephone & Telegraph Co. an easement for communication purposes in certain lands situated in Virginia and Maryland, which had been reported from the Committee on Armed Services with an amendment in section 2, on page 3, line 4, after the name "Baltimore City", to strike out "Maryland."

The amendment was agreed to.

MILEAGE AND OTHER TRAVEL ALLOWANCES OF MILITARY PERSONNEL

The bill (S. 276) to provide for payment and settlement of mileage and other travel allowance accounts of military personnel was announced as next in order.

Mr. LANGER. Let the bill go over.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. GURNEY subsequently said: Mr. President, a little while ago, under objection by the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], Calendar No. 17, Senate bill 276, was passed over. I have since talked with the Senator from North Dakota and I am sure that he is quite well satisfied that there is nothing in the bill to which he now objects.

Mr. LANGER. That is correct. Will the Senator explain the bill for the sake of the record?

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, has the bill been referred to the Comptroller General, and has it received his approval?

Mr. GURNEY. The hearings on the bill do not indicate that it was referred to the Comptroller General.

I may say to the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from North Dakota that a bill in like language was passed by the Senate last year. A similar provision applies to the Navy.

The bill simply makes the official mileage tables of the War Department apply to enlisted men as they now apply to officers. The purpose of the bill is to make pay vouchers more easily handled. It does nothing more than apply the official mileage tables to enlisted personnel as well as to officers. It would not only assist the War Department, but would bring its procedure into line with that of the Navy Department and make for efficiency in the office of the Comptroller General.

Mr. AIKEN. Am I to understand that the Comptroller General has no objection to the passage of the bill?

Mr. GURNEY. I am quite sure of that, although the specific question was not asked of the witness in the hearings held before our committee last Tuesday.

Mr. AIKEN. Was an identical bill in the previous Congress approved by the Comptroller General?

Mr. GURNEY. I would have to ascertain that. I am quite sure that the procedure is approved, because the Navy has had it since 1942. It is now in effect with respect to officers of the Army. The purpose of the bill is merely to bring enlisted men under the provisions of the official mileage tables.

Mr. AIKEN. If the Senator from South Dakota is sure that the Comptroller General has no objection to the bill, I certainly have none.

Mr. GURNEY. I am sure that the committee was of that opinion at the time of the hearing.

Mr. AIKEN. As I understand, the bill itself was not submitted to the Comptroller General.

Mr. GURNEY. It was not submitted by the committee to the Comptroller General. If the Senator wishes to have the bill go over until we can ask that specific question, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. AIKEN. I think that the Comptroller General should have an opportunity to state what effect the bill might have on the work of his department and upon the finances of the Government. I have no desire to delay consideration of the bill. On the other hand, I think the Comptroller General's opinion should be given. Would it make any great difference if the bill were to go over until next Monday?

Mr. GURNEY. Only the difference in time. The bill will of course be considered by the House. I am sure that the committee would like to have it passed at this time.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, with the assurance of the Senator from South Dakota that he is very certain that the Comptroller General would not object to the passage of the bill, I shall raise no objection.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of Senate bill 276?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 276) to provide for payment and settlement of mileage and other travel allowance accounts of military personnel, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That payment and settlement of mileage and other travel allowance accounts of all military personnel, when such accounts are authorized to be based on distances between given points, shall be made in accordance with distances established for payment and settlement of mileage accounts of officers pursuant to the provisions of the act of June 12, 1906, as amended (34 Stat. 246; 10 U. S. C. 870).

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the bills on the calendar.

DEATH OF HON. O. MAX GARDNER

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, it had been my plan, upon the meeting of the Senate today, to speak in commendation and praise of the appointment of O. Max Gardner as Ambassador to Great Britain. This I wanted to do as he traveled toward his post to take up his work as the representative of our country at the Court of St. James's. He was to sail yesterday. We have now received the distressing news that he died a short time before he was to embark upon his trip to England.

Mr. President, I doubt if any appointment made by the President has received more general approval by the people of this country than the appointment of Governor Gardner to be Ambassador to Great Britain. We all know the high importance of the position which he was asked to fill. Those of us who knew him, and who are so much interested in cordial relations between the two nations, were gratified when he was selected. We knew that he could perform his work well, that he would be acceptable to those who were to receive him, and that he would fill the position with honor and credit to his country and to his people.

Mr. Gardner was a member of the Democratic Party, but his nomination received the unanimous approval of the Republican majority of the Senate. His integrity, his fine ability, his experience, and his high sense of fairness lifted him above partisan feelings. He had a distinguished career. He was the Governor of his State and a successful man in his profession and in business. For years he had served in the National Government as adviser to the President, and as Under Secretary of the Treasury. Through his own achievements he gained the esteem and respect of the many who knew him. Death has taken him, and his passing is a very great loss to his country.

I pay my respects, and extend my sympathy to Mrs. Gardner, who through the years has been his faithful and intelligent helper.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. President, the sudden death early yesterday morning of one of North Carolina's most distinguished sons, Hon. O. Max Gardner, Ambassador to the Court of St. James's, brought real sadness to the people of the State and to his many friends throughout the Nation. For more than 30 years he was an outstanding leader in North Carolina. He made an impressive record as a member of the State senate, as Lieutenant Governor, and as Governor. In recent years he has served his Nation in various capacities with great distinction. His courage, character, ability, and dynamic personality made him a natural leader of men. He loved his country and its people, and he devoted his best talents to the welfare of his State and Nation.

I am sure that Members of the Senate who recently unanimously confirmed his appointment as Ambassador to the Court of St. James's join with me and thousands of others in extending to his family profound sympathy.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I am sure that every Senator and every other American citizen, without regard to politics, religion, or geography, was shocked and grieved beyond expression yesterday to learn of the sudden death of Max Gardner. Only last week the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] and I and one or two other Senators expressed our great pleasure at his appointment as Ambassador to Great Britain. I saw him frequently during the last months when he was preparing himself for the great mission upon which he was about to set out. I never saw him in finer spirits, or apparently in finer health. He looked forward to his new task with great interest and devotion.

It seems an inscrutable tragedy beyond the ability of our finite minds to fathom, that upon the very verge of his departure he should have been fatally stricken, and have passed to the next world.

I had predicted that he would have a brilliant career as Ambassador to Great Britain. I feel that he would have added luster to our diplomatic history, and that in the finest American tradition he would have carried forward the great work of conciliation, construction, and peace, insofar as an outstanding ambassador may contribute to that happy result. His death is a great loss to this country, a loss to its public spirit and to its high standards of public service and private character. All of us feel that loss in the public service. Many—of whom I am one—feel a poignant personal loss in friendship, association, and inspiration.

It had been my good fortune to be intimately acquainted with Max Gardner before he came to Washington, and while he was here, as well as with his charming, gracious, and beautiful wife, and with his family. By reason of that relationship I was brought into intimate association with many of his warm friends. No man ever had truer friends; no man ever enjoyed the friendship of a finer circle; no man ever was the recipient of a greater devotion than was Max Gardner among all his friends and all who knew him. I therefore feel that a great personal loss has come to me because of his sudden, tragic death. He was, in a real sense, not only an American, deep-rooted in America's traditions in his personal life and in his attitude, but he was also an earnest Christian. He was profoundly religious. Public men do not always carry their religion on their sleeves. They do not always proclaim from public places their profound devotion to the religious concepts which are the basis of our civilization. Max Gardner, in the truest sense, was a Christian statesman.

We mourn his loss. We express our deep sympathy to his family. We hope that his great example may be a benediction to those of us who remain.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Wyoming. Mr. President, I join with other Senators in paying my respects to a great American—O. Max Gardner.

A week ago on the floor of the Senate we wished him and his wife good health, good luck, and Godspeed. Today we mourn his loss. There is little doubt that the terrific strain which he was under during the past few months hastened the end.

There is little to add to what has already been said today. He deeply appreciated the tributes which were paid to him on the floor of the Senate. What we said then, during his lifetime, we can say tenfold today, now that he is no longer with us. Our thoughts and sympathy are at this time with Mrs. Gardner.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the sentiments which have been spoken in eloquent tribute to O. Max Gardner.

If I may be permitted to make a personal reference, the last act of my wife and myself before retiring on Wednesday evening was to send a telegram to Mr. Gardner and his wife wishing them bon voyage on their trip to England. The shock of the next morning's news was that they never received the telegram, as was the case with many others that were sent to them. He never had an opportunity to depart upon his great mission.

I knew him in his private as well as in his public life. It was impressed upon me that he was one of the most loyal and devoted of friends. He was one of the great Americans of our time. No appraisal of this generation would be adequate without a tribute to the greatness, the kindness, and the goodness of O. Max Gardner.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS PROGRAM

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I have spoken several times in the Senate on the so-called reciprocal trade agreements program and the negotiations soon to be conducted by the State Department at Geneva, Switzerland, with representatives of 18 other countries, looking toward wholesale reduction of our system of tariff protection.

In the past few days several stories have appeared in the newspapers about certain changes in the procedure for handling complaints of injury done under this program. To date, however, no official announcement has been made by the State Department as to these changes, and I am therefore withholding any comment on them for the time being.

Today I wish to touch briefly on the so-called unconditional most-favored-nation feature of that program.

It is very important in considering the tariff question to realize and bear in mind present-day world conditions. When the whole free-trade theory of the economists was first worked out—in fact when the whole low-tariff theory of the Democratic Party was first worked out—we faced a far different economic world from that which we face today. Until the First World War, the usual method of trade regulation for almost all commodities, in almost every country, was a simple system of tariffs. International trade, like domestic trade, was comparatively free from regulation in most countries of the world.

Following the First World War, a great change came over the systems of trade regulation in many countries. During the twenties, many countries added a quota system to their other means of controlling imports. During the thirties, techniques of blocking exchange and permitting particular import shipments only on the basis of exchange licenses were adopted. A system of bilateral agreements came into wide use, particularly in Europe and Latin America. By the terms of such agreements, each of the two countries involved agreed to secure its supplies of a particular commodity from the other party to the agreement. Such agreements obviously leave out in the cold completely any third country which has surpluses which it wishes to market in the export trade. For example, if Britain makes a direct deal with Canada to buy all her wheat from Canada, there will not be much chance to sell any American wheat in the British market. As a side remark at this point, let me say that that is exactly what has happened since the making of the British loan by the United States. I think we are justified in assuming that the wheat producers of the United States are assisting Great Britain and Canada in the disposal of Canadian export wheat.

Another new technique was introduced on a grand scale by Soviet Russia, following the 1917 revolution. This was a program of direct governmental purchase of all commodities to be imported. Starting slowly at first, this technique has gained tremendous momentum. Government buying of an entire quantity of a product to be imported is now one of the principal means of carrying on international trade. In a way, this method may be a natural counterpart of the marked trend toward socialism in many, many countries. No matter what we may think of this trend toward socialism all over the world, we must face it as a fact. It is not likely that we can change it. Great Britain, herself, which used to be considered the home of free international trade conducted by private individuals and corporations, is now one of the leaders in the technique of government mass buying. The commodities which the British Government has been so buying include wool, meat, cocoa, tea, lumber, sugar, eggs, cheese, butter, copper, cotton, and wheat.

This tremendous change in the customary methods of controlling international trade has particular point in connection with the use of the unconditional most-favored-nation policy of the State Department. I shall attempt to explain exactly what this policy means to us here in the United States of America. In each of the trade agreements negotiated or in other trade treaties with the countries concerned, our country guarantees unconditionally to grant to the other nation treatment at least equal to the treatment granted to the most favored nation—the same treatment granted to every other nation, in other words. That is another way of saying that the tariff duties charged on imports shall be the same to every country, except those discriminating against our export trade. Exceptions are made in favor of Cuba and the Philippines, but that is the general policy—namely, the same tariff rate on the same item, no matter what country it may come from.

Mr. President, please observe the effect of this policy in connection with our duty reductions. If we reduce the duty on certain textile items, for example, in an agreement with Great Britain, we must also permit imports of those same items from such countries as Germany, Japan, and Italy to enter our markets at the same low rates of duty. If we reduce duties on items of glassware in an agreement with Belgium, we must permit the same items from Czechoslovakia to enter our markets at the same low rate. The British will receive the concessions that we make to the French, and the French will receive the concessions that we make to the British. Aside from the 18 nations with which we are to negotiate at Geneva in April, there are many other important trading nations, such as Sweden, Spain, Switzerland, Turkey, and Argentina. All those countries will receive the benefit of any duty reductions we may make, although they make no concessions in return. That is the effect of the State Department's unconditional most-favored-nation policy.

In a practical way, this policy has not worked and will not work for the benefit of our export trade, under present world conditions. We shall have very little chance of getting concessions relative to the export markets of any particular countries if they know they will receive the benefit of our new low tariff rates regardless of any action they may take. To give an obvious example: Argentina will not be inclined to make concessions to our exporters in any subsequent negotiations if she can send us her surpluses of meat, dairy products, grains, and wool at low rates of duty which we may establish in agreements with Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa. By giving away all our trading stock at Geneva in agreements with these countries, it will probably be forever impossible for us to secure concessions from the Argentine. That is the practical way in which this policy operates.

I know at least some of the arguments that are made for this policy. It is said that we can guarantee our exporters an equal chance in foreign markets with all other countries. Frankly, that statement is not true, and it is not realistic. We cannot guarantee any such thing to our exporters, and the State Department has not been able to make good on its guaranties. Under present systems of quotas, exchange controls, and government buying, it is too easy for the foreign country to discriminate against us in ways that defy proof. As a practical matter, we do not even know whether we are being discriminated against. When Britain contracted to secure most of her wheat from Canada over the next 5 years at a certain fixed price, was Britain discriminating against us? No one can say for sure.

We do know for sure that if Canada supplies this quantity of wheat to Britain, we shall not sell the British very much wheat. I believe that our wheat farmers are much more interested in actually selling wheat than they are in a paper guaranty against discrimination.

This particular deal is of unusual interest because it will be recalled that at the time when the British and Canadian trade agreements with this country were negotiated in 1939, it was widely advertised that American farmers would be able to compete for the British market for wheat on an exactly equal basis with Canada, Australia, and other countries. To obtain that supposedly valuable concession to our wheat farmers, this country made tremendous reductions of duty rates on textiles, leather goods, metal products, and dozens of other items. Although it is obvious that we are not going to sell much wheat to Britain, the concessions that we made still stand. Now we are going to negotiate with Britain again. Are we going to make still more concessions, again to receive a paper promise that we might sell our wheat to Britain?

I have done a lot of merchandising during my 30 years in business before coming to the Senate. I found by experience that the way to sell grain or flour or anything else is to go to the man who has authority to buy and to sell him the idea of buying from me. A definite commitment from the British Government to purchase a certain quantity of our exportable surpluses of cotton and wheat would be worth many times all the promises of nondiscrimination we have received.

Since I first began to call attention to some of the discrepancies in our present foreign trade policies I have been called all sorts of names. I do not mind that particularly; I am used to it. But I have been charged with trying to wreck our program of reciprocity in trade relations with the rest of the world. I am not opposed to reciprocity. On the contrary, I believe that reciprocity is what we do not have and should have. I believe that if we make valuable concessions which will in fact give foreign countries additional markets, we should gain, in turn, concessions which in fact, not in theory, give our exporters at least equal benefits. I believe that we have enough good traders in America to obtain such concessions, if they are given the opportunity.

The United States has been in existence for quite a while now. We have found it possible to develop the manufacture of almost every type of industrial goods and the production of almost every kind of agricultural product suited to a temperate climate. A system of moderate tariff protection, plus cooperative trade relations with the rest of the world, have helped to make our growth possible. The tremendous wealth of our home market for such things as automobiles has actually made it possible for our motor manufacturers to develop the mass-production methods that have enabled them to expand into the export trade.

Our wealth and our strength have enabled us to provide a market for billions of dollars' worth of goods from abroad. In addition to this market, we have also, during the last few years, provided foreign countries with billions and billions of dollars of loans and gifts—to enable them to stave off starvation and to rebuild their economies.

Mr. President, that is the record of the economic assistance we have already given the rest of the world in recent years. I do not believe anyone can say we have not been generous. Now we are asked to inflict wholesale slashes in the tariff protection on which many domestic industries depend. Such a radical change in our traditional policy deserves, at least, more consideration than it has received to date. I am not opposed to any and all tariff reductions. Reductions, judiciously applied to tariffs on noncompetitive products, could undoubtedly serve a useful purpose in connection with making bargains with other countries. But I am opposed to wiping out, almost at one blow, the system that has made America great. I am opposed to one-sided disarmament on our economic protection, just as I am opposed to one-sided disarmament on the military side.

PROGRAM AFFECTING CIVIL-SERVICE EMPLOYEES

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Civil Service, I feel it my duty reluctantly to bring to the attention of the Senate a situation fraught with very serious and what may prove to be alarming consequences. Far be it from me to criticize any Member of Congress, particularly the chairman of any committee on the House side; and I do not want what I am about to say to be construed as a criticism.

Almost immediately after Congress convened, and upon four different occasions since the convening of Congress, a certain gentleman has, although he is not a member of the House Committee on Civil Service, blazoned to the world that a million civil-service employees are going to lose their jobs. This gentleman has never designated the departments from which these civil-service employees are going to be taken. I do not say that it is a demagogic statement. I do not say that it has been issued for the purpose of securing for him a lot of publicity, as some civil-service workers have alleged. This man may be honest and sincere in his views, but his attitude has already resulted in much demoralization of the civil service.

For 6 years I have been a member of the Senate Committee on Civil Service. During that time, Mr. President, I have seen scores of men and women who have sacrificed thousands and thousands of dollars in order to remain in the public service. For example, I have seen engineers who for years have been getting the low ceiling provided by the laws of this country, when they had been offered salaries as high as $45,000 a year in private industry. Today, Mr. President, there are many employed in the Post Office Department who for years have refused salaries of more than double what they are getting from the Government, offered to them by mail-order houses. We have men and women doctors and nurses scattered from the leper colonies of the warm Pacific to the cold regions of Alaska, who have turned down large salaries because of their love for their country. Practically every person who has made a study of civil service knows that there are thousands of Federal employees who have made Government work their life careers, and that they are proud of what they have accomplished; just as I am proud as I listen to the testimony of some of those who have sacrificed until, from a financial standpoint, it has hurt not only themselves but their families.

Our country won the recent World War because we had the best scientists, the best soldiers, the best know-how in those things that are so essential to victory. We won it because of the loyalty of hundreds of thousands of employees who, time and time and time again, worked long hours regardless of the time and regardless of the fact that for a long time they did not receive overtime compensation in some of the departments. Under civil service, we had men and women who risked their lives in research, just as much as did the soldiers on land or the sailors on the sea. But today, Mr. President, some of these people are being hounded and harassed, and harassed and hounded, because someone may consider it to be popular to say, "We are going to fire a million employees."

The statement is utterly senseless, when it is remembered that we already have upon the statute books the Langer-Byrd amendment and, as a result of the magnificent work of Representative DIRKSEN, of Illinois, provision for a scientific, graduated, continued reduction. This is evidenced—and it could not be evidenced in any better manner—by the testimony of Mr. Arthur Flemming, the Republican member of the Civil Service Commission, which was given recently before the Senate Committee on Civil Service. At that time, Mr. Flemming stated, in response to a question by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE], as follows:

Mr. FLEMMING. Senator THYE, Senator LANGER suggested it might be helpful if I gave a very brief picture to the committee, to bring the committee up to date as far as the Federal Employees' Pay Act is concerned.

First of all, the committee might be interested in having the over-all figure.

We searched the books for the period ending June 30, 1945. At that time—

I should like every Senator to understand the significance of these figures—

we had 3,770,000 on the Federal pay roll, both inside and outside of the continental United States.

We have just received the tentative figures for the period ending December 30, 1946. These figures show we now have on the pay roll, both inside and outside of the continental United States, 2,286,900, or, in other words, a net decrease of 1,483,100.

I thought the committee might like to have that over-all picture.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were most of these decreases?

Mr. FLEMMING. I can give that to you also, Senator LANGER.

For the War Department there has been a decrease from June 30, 1945, down to the present time of 1,244,800.

Senator CHAVEZ. You are talking now of civil personnel?

Mr. FLEMMING. That is right, both inside and outside of continental United States, and both groups paid on an annual basis and hourly employees to which there was reference this morning.

In the Navy Department there has been a decrease of 375,700.

In the Veterans' Administration there has been an increase of 157,000, and for all of these agencies a decrease of 99,700.

That is a rough over-all picture.

The committee might also be interested in knowing, if you take the total employment as of the present time, take the Navy Department, War Department, Post Office Department, and Veterans' Administration, you have 7 percent of the total employment in these four agencies of the Government.

A decrease of 74 percent.

Senator LANGER referred to the personnel ceiling provisions that have been included in the last two pay bills, one known as the pay bill of 1945 and the other of 1946.

It is the latter one that is operative at the present time which the committee will be primarily interested in.

In putting this particular provision in the pay roll in the two pay bills, at the suggestion of both Senator LANGER and Senator BYRD, the Congress said:

"With respect to the departments (other than the Department of War and the Department of the Navy), establishments, and agencies (including Government-owned or controlled corporations) in the executive branch, the Director shall so determine the numbers of full-time civilian employees and the man-months of part-time employment on the basis of the relative needs of such departments, establishments, and agencies for personnel, that the aggregate number of such civilian employees (including the full time equivalent of man-months of part-time employment) shall not exceed—

The Congress fixed the limit at that time—

528,975 for the quarter beginning October 1, 1946; 501,771 for the quarter beginning January 1, 1947; 474,567 for the quarter beginning April 1, 1947; and 447,363 after June 30, 1947.

"With respect to the Department of War and the Department of the Navy, the Director shall so determine the numbers of civilian employees (including the full-time equivalent of man-months of part-time employment) that at the earliest date practicable, but in no event later than July 1, 1947, the number shall not exceed 176,000 with respect to the Department of War, or 100,000 with respect to the Department of the Navy.

"The numbers of employees—

The Congress said—

specified in this paragraph shall be regarded as maximum numbers, and nothing herein shall be construed to limit the authority of the Director to establish lower aggregate numbers whenever, in his opinion, the numbers, so specified, are in excess of those necessary for the proper and efficient exercise of the authorized functions of the departments, establishments, and agencies to which this subsection applies. The procedural provisions of subsection (b) of this section shall be applicable with respect to determinations under this paragraph."

The Congress provided further in the law that it passed:

"No provision of law heretofore or hereafter enacted authorizing the employment of personnel by, or appropriating funds for the compensation of personnel of, or conferring additional functions upon, any department, establishment, or agency, shall be construed to authorize the employment of, or payment of compensation to, a greater number of employees subject to this subsection than the number as determined by the Director with respect to such department, establishment, or agency from the provisions of this subsection, and any such employment or payment not so authorized shall be deemed to be a violation of the provisions of section 3679 of the revised statute of the United States."

The law further states:

"The provisions of this subsection shall not apply with respect to employees whose basic compensation is fixed and adjusted from time to time in accordance with prevailing rates by wage boards or similar administrative authority serving the same purpose. The provisions of subparagraph (A) of paragraph (1) shall not apply with respect to officers and employees in the field service of the Post Office Department or to officers and employees of the Veterans' Administration, but shall apply with respect to officers and employees outside the United States whose compensation is fixed in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and who are not excluded from the provisions of this section by the provision of subsection (f).

"The provisions of subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1) shall not apply with respect to officers and employees outside the several States and the District of Columbia."

At that time Congress did not feel it was wise to fix the ceiling on employment in the War and Navy Departments outside of the United States. That is a provision of law that is now in effect and being administered by the Bureau of the Budget.

The committee may be interested in knowing at the time this provision was worked out it was felt this would go up to June 30, 1947, and I will just give you a summary of it.

You will recall the figure for the classified employment of the War Department was 176,000 and the Navy was 100,000 and for all other agencies 447,363. That gives you a ceiling figure of 723,363.

At that time it was estimated that the per diem employees of the War and Navy Departments would be by June 30, 1947, up to 289,307. It was also estimated that the Veterans' Administration would be up to 165,000 by June 30, 1947, and it was likewise estimated that the Post Office Department would be 433,450.

These were the Bureau estimates and represent the best judgment of these agencies of that time.

If you add all of these figures you get a total employment of 1,167,220 and soon after the pay bill was passed that figure was used quite extensively as a goal to which the Government was working.

I would like to call attention to the fact the Veterans' Administration was excluded from the personnel ceilings. The estimate was that the Veterans' Administration would have by June 30, 1947, 165,000. Actually, as of December 31, 1946, the Veterans' Administration has 220,377. So that you can see that that particular estimate, as far as the Veterans' Administration was concerned, was a low estimate.

In addition, there was an estimate of 433,450 for the Post Office Department on December 31, 1946, and the number of employees of the Post Office Department was 457,574, also subsequent to the passage of the Federal Employees' Pay Act ceiling provision. The law stated that all of the agencies were to be considered as being under the ceiling unless specifically exempted.

The War Assets Administration was exempted and later on, and as of December 31, 1946, the War Assets Administration had 56,552 employees, so that is another group.

Mr. President, last year the Senate and the House Committees on Civil Service met together, not one day, but month after month, in the effort to do a scientific job. The personnel of some departments, instead of being lowered, had been increased. I know I speak for every Senator upon this floor when I say that not one of us would want to see the personnel of the Veterans' Administration decreased. Nor is there a Senator upon this floor who would not want a man who has lost an arm or a leg or who is shell-shocked or ill to get the very best treatment in our hospitals. In the case of other departments calm, careful investigation may show their personnel should be increased in order to secure efficiency for the taxpayers of the country. The members of the Bureau of the Budget, heads of various departments, some of the best informed Senators and Representatives have given this matter very careful study and thought. There is no question that the personnel of some departments will be very materially reduced and brought down to prewar figures, and that some war agencies will be entirely eliminated.

But the cry, "We are going to fire a million employees," has frightened thousands of good, loyal, honest, hard-working, and necessary civil-service employees so that they now feel they are not even going to get for themselves and their families the security to which years and years of hard work have entitled them. From all over the country, we have been receiving telephone calls and messages stating that various departments are in danger of losing some of their best personnel and expressing their concern.

I make this statement in order that these men and women may know that there is not going to be any wholesale, indiscriminate firing, but that so far as the Senate Committee on Civil Service is concerned—and I believe so far as the Senate is concerned—the policy adopted by the Langer-Byrd amendment in the Senate and the Dirksen amendment in the House will be continued.

Furthermore, talk about cutting a million employees interferes seriously with the recruiting of outstanding scientists for the Government's important scientific laboratories. If a scientist who is on the staff of a college or university is approached by one of our Government laboratories with an offer, very naturally he says, "Why should I leave a secure job and go to work for the Government, when I may be laid off the day after tomorrow?" In other words, talk of this kind interferes seriously with the staffing of the Government's highly important scientific laboratories.

If the Congress wants to make substantial cuts below the figures provided for in the Langer-Byrd amendment, the thing for it to do is to make a careful examination of the functions of the Government and to say exactly what functions it wants to eliminate. That is the only way in which we can make substantial cuts in the number of persons on the Federal pay roll. We cannot do it by indulging in generalities to the effect that we are going arbitrarily to cut off a million people and yet not touch any of the functions which Congress has told the executive branch to carry out.

Any western Senators who advocate reclamation and find they have a chance to get it through the operation of various projects can have those projects eliminated and abandoned, by having passed legislation to that effect. Personally, I am opposed to it; I am for reclamation and lots of it. If some Senators who are for REA, as I am, and who believe, as I do, that every farm man and woman ought to have light and power upon their farms and in their homes, would rather have some employees fired than for the farmers to have the benefits of REA, they can get rid of some employees, and they can do it now, but I want to serve notice that I shall continue to fight for REA. If some Senators feel that the veterans are getting too good treatment—that a man who has lost an arm or a leg or an eye is having too many nurses—then some of those who are fighting for a million less employees ought to come out in the open and say so. If some Senators want an Army and Navy of the size it was in 1932, 1933, and 1934, they can get rid of hundreds of thousands of employees merely by having passed legislation to cut down the size of the Army and Navy Departments.

Let those who want to dismiss a million civil-service employees list the departments the personnel of which they wish to have reduced. Let us look at this question realistically; instead of indulging in a lot of loose talk, let us get down to brass tacks, face facts, and be fair to the voters of the country respecting measures submitted to the Congress by indicating when the yeas and nays are called in which of the various departments we want the personnel reduced.

Let me make one thing plain. Under the amendments to which I have referred, every useless, nonessential employee will be dispensed with. As reductions take place, those who received employment under the emergency of war will be removed from the civil-service lists first; and true merit and honesty in service of the Government will continue to be recognized. The policy of an honest day's pay for an honest day's work will be continued. That is the theory upon which civil service originally was established, and that is the theory under which it will continue to operate.

BOOKER T. WASHINGTON MEMORIAL COIN

Mr. BUCK. Mr. President, on behalf of the District of Columbia Booker T. Washington memorial-coin headquarters, I desire to make a brief statement regarding this distinguished American citizen in honor of whom the Seventy-ninth Congress authorized the minting of a commemorative 50-cent coin.

Booker T. Washington was a great American. Theodore Roosevelt has well said of him that—

> For 20 years before his death he had been the most useful, as well as the most distinguished, member of his race in the world, and one of the most useful, as well as the most distinguished, of American citizens of any race.

Both white and Negro owed him much. A firm believer in industrial education for his race, he built virtually by his own endeavor world-famous Tuskegee Institute, which has trained thousands of his race for a useful place in society. His wisdom is never shown better than in the attitude he took as to the part the Negro should play in politics. He said:

> In my opinion, it is a fatal mistake to teach the young black man and the young white man that the dominance of the white race in the South rests upon any other basis than absolute justice to the weaker man. It is a mistake to cultivate in the mind of any individual or group of individuals the feeling and belief that their happiness rests upon the misery of someone else, or their wealth by the poverty of someone else. I do not advocate that the Negro make politics or the holding of office an important thing in his life. I do urge, in the interests of fair play for everybody, that a Negro who prepares himself in property, in intelligence, and in character to cast a ballot, and desires to do so, should have the opportunity.

At Harvard, in 1896, while conferring upon him the first honorary degree conferred by that university on a Negro, President Elliott said, "Teacher, wise helper of his race, good servant of God and country."

The last session of Congress authorized the coining of a new half dollar honoring Booker T. Washington. On February 28 the District of Columbia will celebrate Booker T. Washington Day by launching the sale of these coins. They will be sold for $1, as authorized by law, 50 cents of which will go to the memorial fund to build a specialized industrial training school and shrine on the Washington birthplace in Franklin County, Va.

I hope and urge that many will cooperate in this great and beneficial tribute to a real American.

TAX REDUCTION AND THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, before I ask unanimous consent to introduce into the RECORD a letter from a constituent, I wish to commend the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] for the speech which he has just made on the floor of the Senate. I trust that the leaders of my party will study the speech with great care because I think my party has the responsibility of drawing a distinction between a tax saving through the elimination of unnecessary waste in government and savings brought about by the elimination of unnecessary services of government and, on the other hand, savings which would be disastrous if we made them at the cost of preventing a continuation of adequate defenses in this country and construction of great wealth-producing projects so sorely needed, if we are to have a stable economy in the years ahead. I refer to such projects as McNary Dam and the great flood-control, electric-power, and reclamation projects of the West.

These are days for Lincoln Day speeches, and many spokesmen in my party will be making them. I heard a couple of them last night in this city, and I regretted to find two great Republican leaders coming out with a blanket endorsement of a straight across-the-board 20 percent tax reduction program as a Republican program. I challenge their right to speak for the rank-and-file Republicans of this country, because I do not believe that the rank-and-file Republicans feel that now is the time for any such tax reduction as that, which some leaders in my party are trying to sell the country at this time. I do not believe that we can have any such tax reduction without doing just the type of damage to the economy of this country of which the Senator from North Dakota has spoken today. I do not know of any formal formulation of a Republican tax reduction program as such. I am at a loss to understand why certain Republican leaders are seeking to give the public the impression that their tax views are the views of the Republican Party. They have received no such mandate either from the Republican Party or the Republican voters of this country.

I think it ought to be made clarion clear that some of the Republicans in the Congress of the United States who are speaking in behalf of a 20-percent devastating tax-reduction program do not speak for all the Republicans in the Congress. I am satisfied that they do not speak for the rank and file of Republican voters, because I believe that the people of this country recognize the great importance of our party; first, making secure the national defense; and second, making secure the stable value of the American dollar.

I am waiting for the specific program of tax reduction to which the Senator from North Dakota referred in his speech, when he challenged these self-appointed spokesmen of the Republican Party on taxes, to tell the American people just what services they propose to cut. I am waiting for the specific program of budget cuts which the tax reducers seek to impose upon the American people. I wish to know what services they propose to dispense with. I wish to know on what items the cuts are to be made.

In my judgment, every American citizen who is thinking in terms of the security of this country had better serve notice on the Republican leaders now that this is no time to make any substantial cut in the national-defense program. It simply would not be safe to do so. I have yet to see any figures which indicate that we can make any such 20-percent tax reduction, as some Republican spokesmen have proposed, without cutting into that defense program.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I do not yield at this time.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I have yet to see any proposal which would produce any such tax reduction and still make it possible for us as a party to fulfill an important obligation to the country, and that is to make a substantial payment on the national debt so that we can protect the value of the American dollar. I will not be a party to any movement within my party which seeks to save tax dollars to the American citizen but at the same time takes out of his pocket much greater sums of money by way of a depreciated dollar. I believe that what we need to do as a party is to make savings in Government wherever we can and apply those savings on the national debt.

One further point, and I shall be through, and then I shall be happy to yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

I think we also have an obligation as a party in the Congress of the United States to see to it that we go forward with some great wealth-producing projects. The Senator from North Dakota has referred to one of them, such as the REA. I serve notice now that I shall watch with a searching eye any attempt on the part of certain forces in the Congress of the United States to sacrifice the great wealth-producing projects of the West, so sorely needed in the next few years if we are to develop a sound economy for the entire Nation. We must have such projects in the West if we are to have an extension of the industrial frontiers of America made available by the great natural resources of that section of the country and the great potential power resources which can be developed unless the tax reducers who are talking about a 20-percent tax reduction program have their way in cutting the development of just such great wealth-producing projects.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I do not yield at the moment.

I think the time has come for those of us in my party who do not believe in the type of fiscal philosophy which we heard enunciated from the platform in this city last night by a great leader of our party—I refer to the Speaker of the House—and by some other Republican spokesmen, to carry this issue to the American people and have them speak very clearly to this party as to whether or not they think we ought to save tax dollars in the manner proposed by the budget cutters or whether we ought to apply whatever savings we can make to the national debt so that we can have a sound and stable dollar.

We also have some great social responsibilities to our people to perform as a Government. If my party thinks for a moment that on November 5, 1946, it received a mandate to return to a laissez faire economy in this country; if my party thinks that big business got a green light on November 5, and that it can return to its old practices of the laissez faire economy with its exploitation of human beings for profit dollars then I am satisfied that in 1948 the voters of this country will make very clear to the Republican Party that no such mandate was given in 1946.

Mr. President, in these critical times in our Nation's history there is a responsibility of republican government to see to it that the Government protects the economically weak from the exploitation of the economically strong. I have said that many times on the floor of the Senate, and I am going to say it many times again, because I think it is a very vital principle of government. Hence, we do have a responsibility, as a party and as a government, to see to it that some of the great wealth-producing projects that protect the economically weak and give greater comfort to all of our people go forward. The Republican Party does have a responsibility of carrying forward sound social reforms that seek to promote the greatest good for the greatest number within the framework of our private-property economy.

This particular letter which I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks refers to one of those responsibilities, Mr. President. The people want to know what the Congress of the United States intends to do in this session in regard to strengthening the security of the aged. They wish to know what pension program we seek to offer them. Is the answer going to be, "Let them take their chances with old age?" If that is to be our answer, I think we had better be ready to take our chances in 1948.

I, for one, feel that our social-security system needs to be broadened so as to give greater security to those classes of workers of low and moderate income not now covered by it and so as to remove the fear of want in old age from our people. My party must practice as well as profess the four freedoms.

I now ask unanimous consent to have the letter to which I have referred printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., January 23, 1947.

HON. WAYNE MORSE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I see by the Oregonian that the Senators and Congressmen are now drawing their fat pension which was voted them in the last Congress.

There would not be any service men and women if it had not been for their fathers and mothers. How about a national old-age pension for them? Are they not deserving of some consideration?

You know that the social security is no good for the folks in the now-65-year-old brackets. Will there be any hope for a national old-age pension at this session of Congress?

Yours truly,

J. MANN FISHER.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from Oregon has been making a very good American speech. In my opinion, he is speaking the language of all of the people of the United States, and I have asked him to yield in order that I might express that opinion.

I have been giving considerable study, I say to the Senator, to the proposal of a flat 20-percent across-the-board reduction in taxation, accompanied by the slashing of X billion dollars from the Budget. I find that it is impossible for anyone to give any consideration to those two proposals without coming to the conclusion that the inevitable result will be the destruction of those very enterprises in the West for which the Senator from Oregon has just so eloquently spoken.

One of the principal objects of this Budget-reduction talk is to put an end to the Rural Electrification Administration and to put an end to public power. If that occurs, the public power which in the great State of Oregon has done so much to build up private enterprise will be cut from under the feet of the people of Oregon and the people of all other Western States.

I think it is tremendously important that the Senator speak as forthrightly and as courageously as he does.

The income-tax reduction of 20 percent across the board would have the effect only of giving a pittance of reduction to the economically oppressed and a tremendous reduction, measured in thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars, to those who least need a reduction. But, more important than all that, it would mean cutting down the ability of this Government to pay off the national debt. With a debt of $260,000,000,000, I say to the Senator that if we do not keep our tax revenues high while the people are capable of paying taxes, we shall endanger the payment of the national debt; and when that danger is brought before us, we shall be endangering the entire system of private property. Capitalism has no defense unless it be defended in the United States of America. Those leaders who talk now about tax reduction, while they pay little attention to the constructive expenditures of Government and to the effect upon the national debt, are poor servants of the principle of capitalism.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Wyoming. I certainly share his views.

I have only one more point, Mr. President, and then I am through.

I think we ought to face the fact that there has never been a time in many years in the history of this country when the people were in a better position through taxes to pay a substantial sum on the national debt. I think we ought to recognize, furthermore—it may not be politic to say it, but what difference does that make, for these are times when we ought to be willing to tell the people what we believe the facts to be, irrespective of political consequences—I think we ought to point out to them that we did not take the profits out of the recent war. Today the United States is saturated with blood-money made out of the war. I think we owe it to the men who actually gave human blood in sacrifice for their country to see to it that a substantial proportion of the profits made out of the war now go by way of reasonable taxes as payments on the national debt. I think that is our job as patriotic Members of the United States Congress. By doing that, I think we shall pay proper tribute to the men who made sacrifices to keep our form of capitalistic economy secure in this country. Further I point out that the business boom we will have for some years in this country will be a direct economic result of the war and the profits derived from it should be taxed at reasonably high rates for payments on the war debt.

I am perfectly willing to meet this tax issue on the ground of whether we are going to use such savings as we can make out of economy in government to reduce the national debt and protect our national security, or whether we are going to take the position that we should return those savings to the pockets of the people who now are best able to pay substantial taxes. We cannot have either a costless war or a priceless peace and we owe it to our people to tell them so. My party should stop playing politics with this tax issue.

I close by saying that I do not know what the Republican tax program is. I know of no Republican who knows what the Republican program is and can speak authoritatively for the party on the subject. I am a little bit at a loss to understand the statements of some Republican leaders who stand up and say that the Republican Party has pledged itself to any 20 percent tax reduction program. It is rather interesting that anyone should appoint himself to speak for the Republican Party and announce what its tax program is. I know of no Republican Party pledged to reduce taxes 20 percent.

I say that as a Congress and as individual Members of the Congress we do have a duty and a responsibility to take the fiscal facts about our Government to the people of this Nation. If we do, I think we shall hear from the country. I think the people of this country will tell us in plain terms, which we cannot dispute, that they want us, first, to keep our Nation secure; second, that they want us to make whatever savings we can in the administration of government; third, that they want us to apply those savings to the national debt, so that as the result we shall have a sound dollar; fourth that they want us to go forward with sound social and economic projects that will promote the greatest good for the greatest number of our people.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] for his commendation of what I said a few moments ago relative to the arbitrary discharge of 1,000,000 Federal employees. I wish to say that I appreciate his commendation, coming, as it does, from so distinguished a man who has made such a fine progressive record during the few short years he has been upon this floor.

Personally, I wish to serve notice now that in my opinion when the fight begins for the 20-percent cut in taxes, the distinguished Senator from Oregon will find fighting with him, shoulder to shoulder, upon this floor, many Republicans, especially those from the West; and, I am happy to say, some from the East, who, under his guidance and leadership, will be here to see to it that reclamation projects and the Rural Electrification Administration are not taken out of the life of this Nation.

ACTIVITIES OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, in today's Washington Times-Herald there appears an article with the heading "Truman boom made official by Hannegan." In the story, which carries a New York date line of February 6, it is stated that Democratic National Chairman Hannegan, in speaking before a group of civil-service postal employees at a dinner at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, made the following statement in the course of his remarks:

> We are ready to call upon our President—

To do what, Mr. President? The article states that the call upon our President is for him to seek another White House term in 1948.

The article further states:

> Without any if's or but's, he told a New York gathering of postal supervisors that we are ready to call upon our President again as the man who has proved himself fit for the job.

Mr. President, it seems strange that Mr. Hannegan, who, as the article states, had conferred with Mr. Truman just before he went to New York, would make such "draft Truman" remarks before a dinner in New York of civil-service postal employees who are subject to the provisions of the Hatch Act. In other words, the Truman-Hannegan boom for 1948 is being started with a group of postal civil-service employees who are subject to the Hatch Act and who, by law, should not participate in politics.

Mr. Hannegan, by the way, is also Postmaster General of the United States. Recently, he has been vacationing in Florida for many weeks. In the budget message sent to Congress by the President only a few weeks ago, there appears a statement that there is a prospective $352,000,000 deficit in the postal operations for the fiscal year 1948, more than double the deficit for 1946. In the budget message it was stated that while the volume of mail has expanded enormously, the cost of current operations has increased even more rapidly, and that that is the chief cause of the deficit.

Mr. President, were Mr. Hannegan, the Democratic national chairman and the Postmaster General, to devote himself a little more carefully and studiously to the operation of the Post Office Department, the current operating deficit of that Department might be materially reduced. With a prospective deficit of more than $350,000,000 for 1948, as well as a large deficit for the current year, it looks to me as if, instead of having Hannegan boom Truman for reelection, Truman had better be searching around the country to find a more competent Postmaster General to conduct the Post Office Department. Certainly if the President is beginning a reelection campaign, he should begin it within a civic group in the United States, rather than with civil-service postal employees of the United States Government.

S. Scott Beck, Jr., of Maryland, to be Comptroller of Customs with headquarters at Baltimore, Md., to fill an existing vacancy; and Herbert E. Arnold, of Texas, to be collector of internal revenue for the second district of Texas, to fill an existing vacancy.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will proceed to state the nominations on the calendar.

NATIONAL HOUSING AGENCY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Dillon S. Myer, of Ohio, to be Administrator of the United States Housing Authority in the National Housing Agency.

Mr. CAIN obtained the floor.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CAIN. Certainly.

Mr. TOBEY. Does the Senator from Washington care to have the absence of a quorum suggested?

Mr. CAIN. That is not necessary, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. TOBEY. I shall do whatever the Senator from Washington wishes about it.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I should like to make a very short statement in regard to the proposed confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Dillon Myer to be Administrator of the Federal Public Housing Authority. I have no possible desire to be disrespectful to any member of the committee having jurisdiction over the nomination, because I have a very high regard for the opinions of the members of the committee. However, out of a deep-seated conviction that the FPHA is today pursuing policies which are detrimental to the best interests of the people of the United States, I wish to make it plain and certain that it is not within my power to vote for the confirmation of Mr. Dillon Myer as Administrator of the FPHA.

It goes without saying that there is nothing personal in my opposition to the nomination of Mr. Myer. Until first he came before our committee several weeks ago, I had never met the gentleman in my life. I am, however, critical, and deeply so, of the administration which he heads as Acting Administrator. Until those convictions have been changed, and have been resolved in favor of the FPHA I cannot possibly, as one possessed of any convictions at all, vote for the confirmation of Mr. Myer.

Mr. President, I should like to say that I have no intention of leading a fight in opposition to confirmation by the Senate. In part, I have no intention of doing so for the simple reason that having been here only a few short weeks, I am not presently possessed of sufficient knowledge to lead an important fight. I should like to add that I hope I am wrong in what I think about some of the prevailing policies of the Federal Public Housing Authority. I shall do my very best to prove to myself that I am wrong. If I am able to prove that my contentions are incorrect, I shall, as I advised Mr. Dillon Myer this morning in person, publicly apologize to him, and very freely so, and to every agent of the administration of which he certainly is the Acting Administrator.

So I shall try to do justice to the Administrator and to his staff—namely, I shall try to prove that my assumptions are incorrect and are based upon misinformation or lack of proper information. But, if in trying to prove that I am mistaken, I prove that my charges are correct, I shall most certainly and as rapidly as possible, bring the matters involved to the attention of this magnificent body. I shall do so for the obvious reason that if anything is wrong with any Federal executive agency, the sooner we are aware of those circumstances and facts, the sooner the faults will be corrected and the sooner we shall be able to continue with work of other character that is important to all of us.

Mr. President, I have appreciated the opportunity to voice the convictions of but one Member of the Senate. I desire to repeat, in this connection, that I have a very high regard for the Senators in both parties who in the committee saw fit to vote so favorably and heavily in opposition to my point of view, which is that Mr. Dillon Myer should not be confirmed as Administrator of the Federal Public Housing Authority.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I am glad to reciprocate the fair spirit shown by the able Senator from Washington when he paid tribute to his colleagues on the committee and when he stated that he respected them and was sure that they acted in good faith. I wish to say that the Senator from Washington who has just addressed the Senate acted likewise, in my opinion.

In view of the fact that this matter has arisen on the floor of the Senate as we are about to vote on the confirmation of the nomination of Dillon Myer to be Administrator of the United States Housing Authority in the National Housing Agency, it seemed to me, as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, that for the record I should review the steps taken up to the present point. I shall be very brief.

Several weeks ago the President nominated Mr. Dillon Myer to be Administrator of the United States Housing Authority in the National Housing Agency. Under the rule, the nomination was referred to the Banking and Currency Committee. In the committee it is our custom to have every nominee come before the committee for a personal examination and to submit a statement to the committee. In accordance with that custom, Mr. Myer duly appeared. As I recall, he spent an hour and a half before the committee, at which time he addressed us, and we asked him questions and looked him over. He made a very favorable impression—so much so that when motion was made by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] that the nomination be reported favorably, the vote in favor of reporting the nomination favorably was unanimous.

Following that vote in the committee, the nomination then, under the rule, went on the Executive Calendar of the Senate, I having reported the nomination for the committee. The nomination reposed on the calendar from that day to the next meeting day, when I supposed it would be confirmed, on a pro forma vote by the Senate, without any controversy, because there had been such a unanimous vote in the committee. I was not in the Chamber when the executive session was held on that day. To my surprise, the next morning the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] telephoned me that the day before he had asked that the nomination go over. I asked him why. He said he had done so because some Legionnaires, 9 or 10 in number, who had made a study of housing in various sections of the country, and particularly of public housing, had said to him that there had been serious mismanagement of the low-cost housing situation, and that many persons with low incomes had been unable to obtain adequate low-cost housing. The Senator from Indiana was opposed to the appointment of the man because these customs had prevailed. He asked that he might come to my office with the eight or nine Legionnaires, which he did, and they spent an hour and an half in my office. They were very thorough in their complaints, and they said they had ample evidence to justify their statements.

The Senator from Indiana asked me if I would see that the nomination went back to the committee, and as a matter of senatorial courtesy of course I acceded, and I advised the Legionnaires that due to the request of the Senator from Indiana the nomination would be taken up the next Tuesday, which would have been a week ago last Tuesday. The gentlemen in the room said, "That will not give us sufficient time to get the data together. We ask for more time." I said, "Very well, we will give you a week," that is to February 4. They said, "We will be on hand, will be there in person," and they left the room.

The nomination came before us on the 4th of February. The night before the 4th of February I was told that the commander of the American Legion had sent word to the clerk of the committee, Mr. Hill, that at his request these Legionnaires would not appear and give any testimony, and that they withdrew from the matter. So they did not appear, and nothing was forthcoming after their statement to the Senator from Indiana and myself.

In the absence of any testimony to the contrary, the committee took the matter up de novo, and in the committee room Mr. Myer again was present and was examined by various committee members, and another vote was taken, and the vote was 8 in favor and 2 votes against.

I came on the Senate floor realizing that in justice to the man the nomination should be taken up as soon as possible, as I should want done if I were a nominee. I came on the floor of the Senate and spoke to the only members of the committee who were on the floor at the time, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS], who approved my proposed action, and the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], who also approved, and said he had made his fight and was through. I therefore took the floor and asked that the rule be suspended and that the nominee be confirmed in view of the facts. I had first talked with the Parliamentarian, who confirmed that there was nothing unusual about the procedure. The junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] was in the chair at the time. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] offered objection to the unanimous-consent request, so the nomination again went over.

Today the Committee on Banking and Currency met again to consider the nomination of Mr. Dillon Myer for the third time, and the able Senator from Washington came before us with material which he had received from certain authorities here in Washington, some data and some statements and communications charging bad faith on the part of the nominee in his statements to the committee, and so forth, which made him feel that Mr. Myer was not a desirable appointee.

I listened to the Senator, our colleague and friend from the State of Washington, and then I did what any other Senator would have done: I called for Mr. Myer to come and meet the facts in person, and within 10 minutes' notice he appeared and spent an hour with the committee. There he met the charges of the distinguished Senator from Washington ad seriatim, and at the conclusion of his meeting, the charges and his answers to the examination by the Senator from Washington, the committee again voted, and voted 8 to 1 to confirm the nominee of the President, against the evidence offered by the distinguished Senator from Washington.

So that we have a nomination now before us which three times has been before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, the first time confirmation being voted unanimously, the second time by a vote of 8 to 2, and today by a vote of 8 to 1.

Mr. President, I have seen many men come before committees, and if I am any judge of a fine personality, and of a man who comes in good faith, if I am a judge of character, I pay tribute to Mr. Dillon Myer, the present nominee, as fitting that description. He carried himself forthrightly, as a man; he met every question foursquare, as I think every Senator will testify. In view of the background I have stated, which is conceded, which is in accordance with the truth and the facts, confirmation by the Senate now of the nominee is manifestly in order.

Mr. President, I ask for the question.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, since probably there will be no record vote on the nomination, I wish to have it stated for the RECORD that I am opposed to the nomination of Mr. Dillon Myer. I blocked his nomination last year, and I rather reluctantly withdrew my objection before the committee, but if I have to vote on the question myself, I am opposed to confirmation.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I should like to respond to the Senator from New Hampshire. I think it probably important that the Senate know around which questions the argument concerning Mr. Dillon Myer's appointment revolve. I am satisfied that we are going to hear more about it sooner or later. I think it proper to pose several questions at the moment for the consideration and reflection of all Senators present.

There is an act known as the Lanham Act. It was passed during the early part of the war to make possible the construction of defense houses in those areas where private enterprise was not in a position to build the houses in sufficient numbers to accommodate the demand. That act, like any other act, includes many rules and regulations, some restrictions and some prohibitions and some encouragements to go in different directions, but among other things—and to me this has always been important in connection with the Lanham Act—there is this phrase with reference to the disposition of the houses which were permanently constructed at considerable cost in the early part of the war, namely, that they should be disposed of by sale, provided that none of these permanent units should be turned over to any public or private agency for low-rent use unless specifically authorized by the Congress.

I had not been too familiar with that prohibition, but in the course of the hearings on Mr. Myer's nomination I was advised from the city from which I came to Washington that an agent of Mr. Myer's, his regional director, having offices in the city of Seattle, had gone to the city of Tacoma, where they had not expected his coming, and he had said with reference to 400 units of permanent housing in that city, built under the Lanham Act, "This is what I want the people of Tacoma to do. I want you to sign a resolution memorializing Congress to make available these 400 permanent units of Lanham Act construction for low-rent use, and, citizens of Tacoma," he said, "if you do not do it, these units will very promptly be sold."

I was interested in that, and I became more interested in Mr. Dillon Myer, and, like anyone else who had not known very much about all this, I set to work to get as much information as I could obtain.

Coming out of that information is a conviction of my own that FPHA, through its regional directors and assistants in every region in America, is doing the very best it can, as rapidly and as effectively as it can, to get as many American communities as possible to resolve in favor of taking over these permanent units for low-rent use.

Mr. President, that doubt in my mind must be resolved. I think it has to be resolved in the minds of many Members of the Senate before very long. I do not know what we are going to do about it. Perhaps we are going to think it is legitimate, but it is not legitimate for the FPHA to call the hand of Congress, particularly the Senate, which, so far as I know, is not remotely aware of the existence of the problem.

My curiosity was aroused, secondly, when there came into my hands certain directives which had been flowing through and around and out of the various regional FPHA offices, telling people who lived within these permanent Lanham Act units all over America that it was much more to be desired that they form a mutual cooperative corporation than for them to consider buying these houses as individuals in the private market.

I was further interested and concerned because of the method of financing. According to Mr. Myer's own testimony, he said there is a difference—a positive difference—and he thought it was quite proper, up until very recent days, if there was a desire on the part of occupants to form a cooperative and get their hands on some of these Lanham Act permanent houses which the act prescribes should be sold at full value, they could do it by this method: The mutual group to put down 5 percent, to pay 3½ percent interest, and have 40 years in which to pay for the houses, the United States Government to be their banker.

But if an individual wanted to buy a Lanham Act house for himself, he did it by this method: He put down 20 percent in cash, he paid from 4 to 5 percent interest, and he had from 15 to 20 years in which to pay it off.

The questions I have asked Mr. Dillon Myer, which were not answered to my satisfaction, were simply these: Are your people throughout America encouraging the disposition of permanent Lanham Act projects for low-rent purposes? Are you unduly stimulating and encouraging the development of mutual and cooperative housing trends in America, with which the Senate of the United States is presently not familiar?

His answers to me on those questions have been a flat "No." He said, "That is not our intention; that is not our purpose."

But, gentlemen, to me, on a basis of the inconclusive, because brief, evidence that I have gotten within a very short period of time, I think that is precisely what is going on.

If the Senate can be saved the trouble, 2, 3, 4, or 5 weeks hence, by doing a piece of corrective work, not tomorrow, but today, I think it ought to be done, and that has been my only interest and concern in this matter.

I think probably it is proper to say that Mr. Myer, in a hearing about 4 days ago, was advised of my feelings about these questions, as an individual Senator, and I used the name of a man whom I know and of whom I think highly as a very able individual, one of Dillon Myer's administrative assistants or regional directors in the city of Seattle. I said, "I think Mr. Epstein is doing this, Mr. Myer, and this, and this, and this." He said, "I do not know that he is doing it. I cannot be responsible for what goes on throughout this country by my agents; but I will find out." Today is 4 days later. We have not had any communications from Mr. Dillon Myer, although he said this morning he was going to make certain to get the facts before very long.

But how, in goodness' name, can anyone who has looked into a case which is so full of doubt and uncertainty, vote to confirm an individual who has been in an acting capacity for quite some time, before the arguments in question are resolved?

This is what is going to happen, I think: Mr. Dillon Myer, in pursuance of his duties, is going to ask his regional director in the city of Seattle to come back here and to say yes or no to these questions that have been posed, not only by myself but by at least one other, and by most of the other Senators, and if, when we get the answers, they confirm my suspicions, I do not want to vote against the man, some time from now, that today in the face of my criticisms I might vote for.

I say that doubts have been cast on an important American problem, and it serves absolutely no good purpose at all to confirm into a permanent position a man who, from my point of view, must bear the responsibility of disproving things which have been clearly developed and maintained in his presence.

I trust that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] has not thought me discourteous in again presenting my point of view.

Mr. TOBEY. On the contrary, I would merely add in rebuttal, to sum up—and I say very gladly that I would not impute any discourtesy to the Senator, who I am sure acted from a sense of duty and responsibility as a Senator—that three times the nomination has been before the committee; the first time, after an hour and a half, the vote in favor was unanimous; on the second occasion, after an hour and a half, the vote was 8 to 2, and in the third instance, after an hour, the vote was 8 to 1.

Mr. CAIN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. TOBEY. Go ahead, correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. CAIN. Merely in the interest of accuracy; the vote this morning was 6 to 1. We were losing members.

Mr. TOBEY. Since then two Senators, who had to leave the hearing, asked that their votes be recorded.

Mr. CAIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. TOBEY. As I have stated, three votes have been taken, and I think the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], who was present, would not object to my repeating a statement he made to me. As he left the room, since he was about to leave for Ohio, he came over and said to me, "I want to be recorded for him. I am more in favor of him now than I was the last time." That was the statement of the Senator from Ohio to me, and the vote today was 8 to 1.

I say in all candor, we make mistakes about human nature, of course, but if I know a man, and a forthright one, that man's name is Dillon Myer.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Dillon S. Myer to be Administrator of the United States Housing Authority in the National Housing Agency?

The nomination was confirmed.

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next nomination on the Executive Calendar.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of James W. Lauderdale, of the District of Columbia, to be a member of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia for the remainder of the term expiring June 30, 1947.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask that the President be notified immediately of the action that has been taken.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the President will be so notified.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request. Under a standing order of the Senate the President pro tempore of the Senate a few days ago designated the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB] to read Washington's Farewell Address to the Senate on February 22. Because of the fact that the Senate will not be in session on that date, it being a Saturday, unless the general program is changed, I make the following unanimous-consent request:

I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the order heretofore entered designating the Senator from West Virginia to read Washington's Farewell Address on February 22 next, be made applicable to Friday, February 21, 1947.

I may say in explanation that this suggested change from Saturday to Friday has the complete approval of the Senator from West Virginia, who is to read the Farewell Address, and it has also been brought to the attention of the President pro tempore of the Senate, and I believe has his approval.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PRINTING OF FINAL REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE PETROLEUM RESOURCES

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I desire to announce that the final report of the Special Senate Committee To Investigate Petroleum Resources will go to press at the Government Printing Office within the next few days. The Superintendent of Documents has advised me that this report will be available to the public at 15 cents a copy. I am advised that Government agencies which may desire to obtain copies may order them while the document is on the press, at a cost of about $64.95 per thousand. I make the announcement because there has been considerable demand for copies of the report.

The Subcommittee on Printing of the Committee on Rules and Administration has been requested to approve the printing of 3,000 copies; 500 for the Senate document room, 500 for the House document room, and 2,000 to be distributed to the list of those who have already applied to the special committee for copies.

PROGRAM FOR THE COMING WEEK—ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I desire to make a very brief statement for the general information of Senators who may want to be absent from the Senate at any time during the coming week. I shall move later that the Senate adjourn until Monday of next week. On Monday we will recess or adjourn until Tuesday. On Tuesday it is my purpose to ask that the Senate stand in recess or adjournment until Friday, February 14. It is my hope that on Friday the 14th no business will be transacted unless by unanimous consent, and that we shall then adjourn until Monday the 17th of February. I make that statement for the general information of the Senate. I now move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 10, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1947

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. Time is short, and no one of us knows how little time he has left. May we be found using wisely our time, our talents, and our strength. Break to us this day the "bread of life." Our hearts are hungry, as are the hearts of people everywhere. Save us from thinking, even for a moment, that we can feed our souls on things. Save us from the vain delusion that the piling up of wealth or comforts can satisfy. Save these, Thy servants, the chosen of the people, from the tyranny of the nonessential, from the weary round of that which saps strength, frays nerves, shortens life, and adds nothing to their usefulness to Thee and to this Nation. Help them to give themselves to the important, and to recognize the trivial when they see it. Give them the courage to say "No" to everything that makes it more difficult to say "Yes" to Thee. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. WHITE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, February 7, 1947, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

RULING ON BILLS PROPOSING CORRECTION OF MILITARY RECORDS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wishes to submit a point of order to the Senate and particularly calls the attention of the able Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] to what the Chair is about to say.

The Senate will appreciate that we confront under the Reorganization Act a constant necessity of making new rulings for which there is no precedent; indeed, we are now constantly setting a body of new precedents under the amended rules as required by the Reorganization Act. Therefore, each time one of these new points arises, since it is very important that these precedents should be correct, it is the purpose of the Chair to submit his rulings in open session so that the matter may be fully discussed and fully determined as the Senate wishes the determination to be made.

The Senator from North Dakota has submitted a bill for the relief of Thomas A. Ryland, the purpose of which is as follows:

Shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said organization.

The Chair calls the attention of the able Senator from North Dakota to the fact—and the Senator will understand there is nothing personal about this matter; the Chair is simply undertaking to establish the fact—that section 131 of the Reorganization Act provides:

SEC. 131. No private bill or resolution (including so-called omnibus claims or pension bills), and no amendment to any bill or resolution—

Which does any of the following things:

* * * or (3) the correction of a military or naval record, shall be received or considered in either the Senate or the House of Representatives.

It seems to the Chair that section 131 intends to put a definite termination to the introduction of private bills for the correction of military records, and it is the opinion of the Chair, which the Chair submits first to the able Senator from North Dakota for his comment and then to the Senate, that the bill proposed by the able Senator cannot be received.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I took this matter up with the legislative counsel. There will be no appeal from the decision of the Chair. There was a desire that there be a determination of this question because of the great importance of a ruling to the particular veteran involved. So far as I am concerned, I am satisfied with the ruling.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is greatly obliged to the Senator for his statement.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I express my complete approval of the ruling of the Chair with respect to the matter just referred to by him. The denial of the right to introduce such private special bills is one of the great savings of the time and energies and thought of individual Senators, and of the Senate itself, which it was believed would be brought about by the Reorganization Act. It lifted from the Senate a tremendous mass of detail. I approved the principle when it was written into the act, and, as I have indicated, I approve the ruling of the Chair with respect to it.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting several nominations, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

PROTOCOL CONCERNING THE INTERNATIONAL OFFICE OF PUBLIC HEALTH—REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As in executive session, the Chair lays before the Senate Executive D, Eightieth Congress, first session, a protocol concerning the Office International d'Hygiène Publique, signed at New York on July 22, 1946. Without objection, the injunction of secrecy will be removed from the protocol, and it will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The protocol is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith a certified copy of a protocol concerning the Office International d'Hygiène Publique, signed at New York on July 22, 1946.

The protocol provides for the termination of the Rome Agreement of 1907 (the arrangement for the establishment of the International Office of Public Health signed at Rome on December 9, 1907), and for the transfer of the duties and functions of the International Office of Public Health to the World Health Organization, or its Interim Commission.

I also transmit herewith, for the information of the Senate, the report of the Secretary of State with respect to the protocol.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 10, 1947.

[Enclosures: 1. Report of the Secretary of State; 2. Certified copy of the protocol concerning the Office International d'Hygiène Publique, signed at New York on July 22, 1946.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 7, 1947.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a certified copy of a protocol concerning the Office International d'Hygiène Publique, signed at New York on July 22, 1946.

The protocol provides for the termination of the Rome Agreement of 1907 (the arrangement for the establishment of the International Office of Public Health signed at Rome on December 9, 1907), and for the transfer of the duties and functions of the International Office of Public Health to the World Health Organization, or its interim commission. The protocol was signed in the English, French, Chinese, Russian, and Spanish languages by plenipotentiaries of the United States of America (with a reservation "subject to approval") and a number of other countries. According to information received by this Government from the Secretary General of the United Nations, the depositary of the present protocol, nine of the countries parties to the Rome Agreement of 1907, have already accepted the protocol, namely: Bolivia, Bulgaria, Canada, New Zealand, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Turkey, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

In the period between the world wars there existed two official international health agencies of world scope, the Health Organization of the League of Nations, and the International Office of Public Health at Paris. The latter organization was established and maintained in accordance with the arrangement for that purpose signed at Rome on December 9, 1907 (Treaty Series 511). The United States became a party to that arrangement by the deposit of its instrument of ratification with the Italian Government on August 1, 1908. Under the provisions of that arrangement, and those of the International Sanitary Convention, signed at Paris on June 21, 1926 (Treaty Series 762), the International Sanitary Convention for Aerial Navigation, signed at The Hague on April 12, 1933 (Treaty Series 901), both of which are in force between the United States and a large number of other countries, and certain other international agreements, the International Office of Public Health was responsible for the receipt of epidemiological information and for its distribution to the principal public health authorities of the participating governments, and for certain other administrative duties in relation thereto.

A third organization entered the international health field through the necessities of war. Since the International Office of Public Health could not perform effectively, from its European base, the international exchange of epidemiological information, the International Sanitary Convention, 1944, Modifying the International Sanitary Convention of June 21, 1926 (Treaty Series 991) and the International Sanitary Convention for Aerial Navigation, 1944, Modifying the International Sanitary Convention for Aerial Navigation of April 12, 1933 (Treaty Series 992) were drawn up and signed by a certain number of countries, members of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (UNRRA), giving that organization the authority and responsibility to carry on this important work. Protocols prolonging the 1944 Conventions were opened for signature on April 23, 1946, and entered into force on April 30, 1946 (Treaties and Other International Acts Series 1551 and 1552). Article II of each of those protocols provided for the continuation of the performance by UNRRA of the duties and functions assigned to it by the 1944 conventions to which the particular protocol related, but only until such time as a new international health organization should be established. In the event a new international health organization had not been formed, or, having been formed, was unable to perform the above duties and functions by the date UNRRA terminated its activities, the duties and functions were to be entrusted to the International Office of Public Health. The United States is a party to both of the 1944 conventions and to protocols prolonging those conventions.

The end of the war found a strong movement under way for the establishment of a new international health organization which would be effective and broad enough in its scope to cover adequately the field of international public health, and particularly to deal with the problems created by the swiftness of modern transportation and the progress of modern scientific knowledge. The desire for the realization of that objective did not mean that there was not clearly realized the importance of the epidemiological work of the International Office of Public Health as well as of that carried on by UNRRA, and the need of continuation of such work without interruption. It was felt, however, that that work should go on as part of the functions of a single international public health organization within the framework of the United Nations.

In 1945 and early 1946 the Department of State and the United States Public Health Service prepared a draft of a constitution for a projected international health organization. The Department of State convened on October 11 and 12, 1945, an advisory health group, composed of national leaders in health and civic affairs, which studied and amended the above-mentioned draft and adopted a resolution strongly urging early action in the establishment of an international health organization. The Senate on December 20, 1945, adopted unanimously Senate Joint Resolution No. 89 requesting the President to urge upon the United Nations the prompt convening of an international health conference and the formation of an international health organization. On February 15, 1946, the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations adopted a resolution calling for the early formation of a single international health organization of the United Nations and instructing the Secretary-General to convene for that purpose the International Health Conference not later than June 20, 1946.

The International Health Conference met in the city of New York from June 19 to July 22, 1946. At that conference advantage was taken of the opportunity to lay the foundation for a single international health organization, an opportunity which had been missed in an earlier era. The constitution of a World Health Organization was adopted and signed by representatives of 61 nations, and provision was made for continuing the work of existing international health agencies pending their absorption by the World Health Organization. An Interim Commission, consisting of the representatives of 18 governments, was established to carry on necessary international health work pending the acceptance of the constitution by a sufficient number of members of the United Nations to bring into existence the World Health Organization.

In its final act, the International Health Conference incorporated a resolution requesting the United Nations to transfer as soon as possible to the World Health Organization or its Interim Commission the duties and functions of the Health Organization of the League of Nations which had been taken over by the United Nations. Provision was made by the Conference in the arrangement establishing the Interim Commission for that Commission to assume the duties and functions assigned to UNRRA by the International Sanitary Conventions of 1944. Because of its unique status as defined in the Rome agreement of 1907, the dissolution of the International Office of Public Health and the transfer of its functions to the World Health Organization presented a more difficult problem.

Under the terms of article 8 of the Rome Agreement of 1907, each state had the right to withdraw from the Office at the end of each period of 7 years, providing a year's notice is given as set forth in that article. The present 7-year period, however, does not end until November 15, 1950. Also, the functioning of the international health machinery is based on the sanitary conventions which have been accepted by the great majority of countries and which contain important provisions dealing with the role of the International Public Health Office in the application of those conventions. It was of first importance for world public health that the continuous functioning of this system should not be disturbed. It was necessary, therefore, to seek a solution which would permit the rapid establishment of a single world health organization and at the same time would not interrupt the efficient working of the international health services and the flow of epidemiological information.

The Technical Preparatory Committee of the World Health Conference recommended, accordingly, that the Office should be absorbed by the proposed new organization and suggested to the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations that invitations to the Conference include a request that states empower their delegates to the Conference to take appropriate action to effect such absorption. As a result the delegations were, in general, empowered to take such action. A draft protocol designed to accomplish the absorption of the Office by the World Health Organization was presented to the Conference by the United States delegation and, with slight modifications, was adopted by the Conference and signed concurrently with the constitution. It is this protocol of which a certified copy is enclosed herewith.

In article 1 of the protocol the signatory governments agree that, as between themselves, the duties and functions of the Office as defined in the agreement signed at Rome on December 9, 1907, shall be performed by the World Health Organization or its Interim Commission, and that, subject to existing international obligations, they will take the necessary steps to accomplish such purpose.

In article 2 the parties to the protocol further agree that, as between themselves, the duties and functions conferred upon the office by certain international agreements enumerated in an annex to the protocol shall be performed by the organization or its interim commission. Of the conventions and agreements listed in the annex, the United States is a party to those numbered in that annex as 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 10.

Article 3 provides that the agreement of 1907 shall be terminated and the office dissolved when all parties to the agreement have agreed to its termination. It is also provided in article 3 that any government party to the agreement of 1907, by becoming a party to the protocol, has agreed to the termination of the agreement of 1907.

Article 4 provides that in the event that all the parties to the agreement of 1907 have not agreed to its termination by November 15, 1949, the parties to the protocol will then, in accordance with article 8 thereof, denounce the agreement of 1907.

Articles 5, 6, and 7 are formal in their character. They relate to acceptance of the protocol, accession thereto, and entry into force. In accordance with the provisions of article 5, any government a party to the agreement of 1907 and not a signatory to this protocol may at any time accept it by sending an instrument of acceptance to the Secretary-General of the United Nations. Article 6 provides that governments may become parties to the protocol by (a) signature without reservation as to approval, (b) signature subject to approval followed by acceptance, or (c) acceptance. It is provided in article 7 that the protocol shall come into force when 20 governments parties to the agreement of 1907 become parties to the present protocol.

Respectfully submitted.

G. C. MARSHALL.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

SUPPLEMENTAL AND CONSOLIDATED FLYING PAY REPORTS

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, pursuant to law, supplemental and consolidated reports showing the number of officers above the rank of major during the 6-month period, June 1 to November 30, with the average monthly flight pay authorized by law to be paid to such officers during that period (with accompanying reports); to the Committee on Armed Services.

CONTROL AND ERADICATION OF FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE AND RINDERPEST

J., for use by that organization in training boys; to the Committee on Armed Services.

REPORT OF FOOD AND DRUG ADMINISTRATION

A letter from the Administrator of the Federal Security Agency, transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report of the Food and Drug Administration for the fiscal year 1946 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the PRESIDENT pro tempore:

A resolution adopted by the Assembly of the State of California, relating to the San Joaquin Experimental Range of the United States Forest Service, Department of Agriculture, in Madera County, Calif.; to the Committee on Appropriations.

(See resolution printed in full when laid before the Senate on February 3, 1947, p. 730, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

A resolution of the Legislature of the State of Utah; to the Committee on Armed Services:

"Resolution memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States of America to cause the proposed sale of the town of Dragerton, Utah, to be withdrawn from sale as a unit and to offer it for sale to present occupants, veterans and others in units of one house and lot in each sale

"Whereas the War Assets Administration is advertising and offering for sale as a unit sale the entire town of Dragerton, Utah, consisting of 604 dwellings, 377 acres of land, a dormitory, school house, hospital, church, theater, store buildings, waterworks system, sewer system, and electric lighting system; and

"Whereas the town of Dragerton was built by the Government during the war for the purpose of housing employees of the Geneva mine at a cost of more than $5,000,000; and

"Whereas the sale of this town as a unit sale would permit but few bidders to participate therein; and

"Whereas said sale would preclude people in ordinary circumstances from participating; and

"Whereas the buildings and homes of this town are now occupied by tenants who are employees of the large coal mines in that vicinity and by veterans of World War II; and

"Whereas there is much concern and unrest among the present occupants of the buildings over the proposed sale since it precludes them from purchasing any of the homes and lots; and

"Whereas bids are to be received for the purchase of this entire town as a unit sale on or before 2 p. m., February 14, 1947, at building No. 3, 1710 South Redwood Road, Salt Lake City, Utah: Be it therefore

"Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Utah (the Governor concurring therein), That we urge the President and the Congress of the United States to withdraw from sale as a single unit the town of Dragerton, Utah, and that all bids received for the purchase of this town as a unit be canceled; and be it further

"Resolved, That each house and lot in said town be offered for sale at a fixed price, first, to the present occupants of said home, second, to veterans of World War II and third, to other interested persons; that such sale be made upon the conditions of a reasonable down payment and reasonable terms; and be it further

"Resolved, That we urge the President and Congress to give their immediate attention to this matter; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state shall be directed to immediately send a copy of this memorial to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative of the United States Congress from Utah."

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arizona; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"Senate Joint Memorial 2

"Joint memorial requesting action to prevent the spread of the foot-and-mouth disease

"To the President and the Congress of the United States:

"Your memorialist respectfully represents:

"An outbreak in the States of the Republic of Mexico bordering on the United States not only imperils the cattle industry of that country but constitutes an imminent threat to the widespread cattle industry of the Western States of this country.

"The prevention of the spread of this plague is not only of vital concern to those directly engaged in the growing of cattle but as well to all the people, as it threatens to affect both the health and the economic welfare of the States.

"Wherefore your memorialist, the Legislature of the State of Arizona, prays:

"1. That the President and the Congress take such steps as may be necessary, to:

"(a) Appropriate adequate funds to the United States Bureau of Animal Industry to prevent, control, and eradicate foot-and-mouth disease in this country.

"(b) Offer assistance to the Republic of Mexico in locating, diagnosing, and eradicating foot-and-mouth disease in Mexico to the fullest extent permitted by that country.

"(c) Create a joint United States-Mexico commission, empowered to deal with the problem and to control, eradicate, and prevent the spread of foot-and-mouth disease in each of such countries.

"(d) Close the United States-Mexico border to all importations or traffic of whatever kind or nature that may carry the infection of the foot-and-mouth disease into this country.

"(e) Help maintain all quarantine lines established within Mexico north of the infected areas."

A memorial of the Senate of the State of Arizona; to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"Senate Memorial 1

"Memorial requesting an investigation of the administration of the Office of Price Administration in Arizona

"To the Congress of the United States:

"Your memorialist respectfully represents:

"The administration of the Office of Price Administration in Arizona has occasioned widespread dissatisfaction throughout the State, worked irreparable injury and injustice to many citizens, and particularly with respect to the administration of rent controls, has not only been flagrantly discriminatory, impaired investments, and dealt harshly, unfairly, and unlawfully with owners of rental property, but has adversely and seriously affected the problem of supplying homes to the thousands of returned veterans and their families and other people needing them.

"Wherefore your memorialist, the Senate of the State of Arizona, urgently requests:

"1. That the Congress of the United States cause an investigation to be made at an early date of the operations of the Arizona Office of Price Administration to the end that the abuses complained of be corrected, and if it be found that they have been caused or contributed to by criminal acts, that the guilty persons be punished."

By Mr. WILSON:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa; to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 6

"Whereas the housewives of America have patiently and patriotically exercised during the period of hostilities and for more than a year since the cessation of hostilities, the strictest economy in the use and consumption of sugar as a part of their contribution to the war effort; and

"Whereas sugar is indispensable for a well-balanced American diet, and housewives cannot prepare satisfactory meals without an adequate supply of sugar; and

"Whereas the waste resulting from the lack of sufficient means of preserving food stuffs through the scarcity of canning sugar can no longer be justified, since this Nation has not been at war for the past 18 months; and

"Whereas Iowa, in common with other great agricultural States, produces many crops which require sugar for preservation, such as fruits, berries, and vegetables, and in the past year losses in these products, because of the limited sugar available, have been estimated at several millions of dollars; and

"Whereas the absence of sugar for canning purposes has caused thousands of tons of fruit to spoil, thereby depriving American families of a much needed food, and has caused hardships and financial losses in many farming and canning communities; and

"Whereas labor in the food processing industry has been without work because of the sugar shortage; and

"Whereas in 1946 the sugar under the direct control of the United States increased by more than one-half million tons and no portion of this increase was made available to the American people: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the senate (the house concurring), That the Congress of the United States is respectfully requested to provide by law for an immediate decontrol of sugar for home consumption, and for industrial use; and be it further

"Resolved, That Congress is respectfully requested to remove all controls from the production, processing, distribution, rationing, sale, and importation, of sugar without delay; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the President of the United States Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of Congress, and to the Iowa Members of the United States Senate, and the Iowa Members of the House of Representatives of Congress."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 10

"Whereas present facilities for caring for all veterans are inadequate; and

"Whereas many patients requiring immediate medical attendance are neglected due to lack of facilities, resulting in undue hardship, suffering, and death; and

"Whereas there are at present existing facilities that can be utilized without further expenditure of public money and use of critical materials; and

"Whereas Schick General Hospital, a $12,000,000 Army hospital located at Clinton, Iowa, is now available for such contemplated uses: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the senate (the house concurring), That the Veterans' Administration is respectfully requested to utilize Schick General Hospital at Clinton, Iowa, with its suitable facilities and very desirable location for the permanent care of veterans; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the President of the United States Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of Congress and to the Iowa Members of the United States Senate and the Iowa Members of the House of Representatives of Congress and Gen. Omar Bradley of the Veterans' Administration."

By Mr. BUTLER:

Resolutions adopted by John Zonik Chapter No. 24, American War Dads, of Chadron, Nebr., protesting against the enactment of legislation granting citizenship to any individual who carried arms, or who worked in any war industry of an enemy nation fighting against the United States or her Allies in World War II, and also against the present admission of 100,000 aliens into the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Omaha, Nebr., favoring sufficient appropriations to complete the so-called Garrison project in the State of North Dakota; to the Committee on Appropriations.

A resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Omaha, Nebr., favoring sufficient appropriations to complete the so-called Missouri River Basin; to the Committee on Appropriations.

PROHIBITION AGAINST INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION OF LIQUOR ADVERTISING

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask that there may be referred to the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce several petitions signed by interested citizens in the State of Minnesota appealing for congressional action prohibiting interstate transportation of liquor advertising such as is provided in my bill, S. 265.

The petitions which I present are but samples of numerous similar appeals coming to me from other sections of Minnesota and from almost every other State in the Union.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions presented by the Senator from Kansas will be received and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

LETTER AND RESOLUTIONS OF FARMERS GRAIN DEALERS ASSOCIATION OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from C. H. Conway, Secretary of the Farmers Grain Dealers Association of North Dakota, together with three resolutions adopted by that organization.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the letter and resolutions presented by the Senator from North Dakota will be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

To the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

FARMERS GRAIN DEALERS ASSOCIATION OF NORTH DAKOTA,
Fargo, N. Dak., February 4, 1947.

Hon. MILTON R. YOUNG,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The attached resolutions were unanimously adopted by the Farmers Grain Dealers Association of North Dakota in convention assembled January 28, 29, and 30, 1947, in the city of Fargo.

These resolutions, among others adopted by the convention, are expressly addressed to you for your utmost consideration. We believe they deal with the most momentous questions of the day and merit the consideration and action of not only those to whom they are addressed but to all other citizens.

Kindly give the resolutions the merit which, in your judgment, they deserve.

Very truly yours,

C. H. CONAWAY,
Secretary.

"BOXCAR SUPPLY

"Whereas the supply of grain boxcars has been short of actual needs for this territory and this short supply has resulted in a great financial loss to producers and their country elevators; and

"Whereas our railroads serving this territory have been forced to operate on approximately 50 percent of their own equipment, while many eastern roads have been given 150 percent and more of car supply for less-than-carload freight; and

"Whereas impractical direction of transportation by the Office of Defense Transportation has resulted in discrimination against producers of this section in favor of eastern manufacturers and processors; and

"Whereas the evidence clearly indicates that arbitrary ODT orders have been the cause of maldistribution of available boxcar supply and consequent backing up of food supplies in the country: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That this convention of farmers and representatives of country elevators go on record as favoring the removal of all controls over boxcar supply and distribution and that authority be given the various railroad units to govern and allocate their equipment according to the needs of their own patrons in keeping with a normal connecting-line arrangement necessary to the operation of all American railroads.

"It is the desire of this convention that a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Association of American Railroads, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and Representatives in Congress from North Dakota."

To the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"WHEAT BONUSES

"Whereas it has been demonstrated time and again that Government ceiling prices have been lifted to the detriment of many producers of agricultural products; and

"Whereas these losses have accrued to the benefit of those persons and companies protected by financial reserves who were able to pay expenses and hold commodities off the market; and

"Whereas irresponsible and inexperienced Government control of OPA regulations have created financial loss and hardship among our farmers; and

"Whereas this evidence of bad faith on the part of the Government will result in lack of interest in production of vital commodities needed in a well-balanced agricultural production program: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the full support of this convention be given to sponsors of bills in Congress providing for bonus payments, denied thousands of farmer producers, paid by the Government for wheat to be shipped for foreign relief; and, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the 30 cents per bushel bonus paid by the Department of Agriculture to certain farmers who held their 1945 wheat until well into the 1946 season be made available to all farmers who sold their wheat grown in 1945; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to North Dakota Representatives in Congress and to the Governor of North Dakota, as well as to the speaker of the North Dakota House of Representatives, and the president of the Senate, now in session."

"FLAX BONUS

"Whereas the crying need of the Nation concerns all of us with regard to flax production this coming season, and

"Whereas our farmers have become discouraged and are now showing little or no enthusiasm for flax production at this time, and

"Whereas lifting of flax-ceiling prices by the OPA did result in a $3 per bushel advance in prices after most producers had sold their flax, and

"Whereas no serious effort has been made by the Government to repay those losses: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That Congress make some equitable adjustment of these losses to farmer producers who sold their flax under Government pressure and that this adjustment be based on present market prices for flax, allowing for handling charges with a reasonable margin of profit to marketing agencies and processors; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to our representatives in Congress and to the Governor of North Dakota, the speaker of our State house of representatives and the president of the senate."

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS

Mr. WATKINS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 60) to authorize the San Carlos Irrigation and Drainage District, Arizona, to drill, equip, and acquire wells for use on the San Carlos irrigation project, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

REPORT OF EXAMINATION OF SENATE DISBURSING OFFICE

Mr. BUSHFIELD. Mr. President, I desire to submit to the Senate a statement by the Secretary of the Senate.

When the present Secretary was elected to his position, the Republican personnel committee requested an audit of the Senate Disbursing Office. That audit has been made, and I send to the desk a statement by the Secretary regarding the audit, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, February 4, 1947.

Hon. HARLAN J. BUSHFIELD,
Chairman, Republican Personnel Committee, United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR BUSHFIELD: Promptly upon my election as Secretary of the Senate, and pursuant to the direction of the Republican personnel committee, I requested Hon. Lindsay C. Warren, Comptroller General of the United States, to have his office examine the books and accounts of the Senate Disbursing Office and to give me a statement as to their condition.

A copy of the Comptroller General's report, submitted under date of February 4, 1947, made in response to my request, has been received. I have read the same, and, in my opinion, it shows that a very thorough and complete examination of the books and accounts of said office has been made.

It appears therefrom that all funds not disbursed or accounted for as provided by law were found to be on hand or on deposit in the Treasury.

Very respectfully yours,
CARL A. LOEFFLER,

NATIONAL HEALTH ACT OF 1947

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, in behalf of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BALL], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL], I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to coordinate the health functions of the Federal Government in a single agency, and for various other purposes, about which I may have an opportunity to speak briefly at the end of the morning hour.

The bill (S. 545) to coordinate the health functions of the Federal Government in a single agency; to amend the Public Health Service Act for the following purposes: To expand the activities of the Public Health Service; to promote and encourage medical and dental research in the National Institute of Health and through grants-in-aid to the States; to construct in the National Institute of Health a dental research institute, and for other purposes; introduced by Mr. TAFT (for himself, Mr. SMITH, Mr. BALL, and Mr. DONNELL), was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

ANNUAL SICK LEAVE FOR RURAL LETTER CARRIERS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, a short time ago the Comptroller General gave a decision eliminating Saturdays from annual and sick leave for rural letter carriers. In my opinion that is most unjust and unfair. I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to correct that situation.

The bill (S. 547) to provide for annual and sick leave for rural letter carriers, introduced by Mr. LANGER, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

BALANCED PEACETIME FEDERAL BUDGET, AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, at the last session of Congress, I introduced a Senate joint resolution providing for an amendment to the National Constitution which if adopted would provide and bring into being an automatically balanced Federal Budget in peacetime. I have great pleasure in reintroducing the joint resolution today in behalf of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the able chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and myself, for such reference as the Chair may see fit to make.

The joint resolution should, I believe, properly be referred to the Judiciary Committee, which has jurisdiction, under the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, of all amendments to the Federal Constitution. However, in considering the matter it will be necessary to make a great many financial computations, based on the experience of the Appropriations Committee; and I respectfully suggest to the consideration of the Chair that the joint resolution be temporarily referred to the Appropriations Committee, with the understanding that it shall then be referred to the Judiciary Committee for final action; the point being that if we are in a position to make a report showing the construction of the appropriations for the Judiciary Committee's consideration, it will be in a better position to consider the merits of the joint resolution than if the Judiciary Committee takes it ab initio, without a knowledge of the ingredients involved in making appropriations in the Appropriations Committee.

I respectfully suggest to the Chair that he make some exploration as to how we can get the factual information from the Appropriations Committee before this matter goes to the Judiciary Committee, which should have final jurisdiction of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair welcomes the suggestion of the able Senator. The ruling will be held in abeyance until the matter can be studied.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently said: The Chair is now prepared to rule on the point of order raised by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], whose attention the Chair asks.

The Senator from Maryland asked that a Senate joint resolution, proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to fiscal matters, be referred first to the Committee on Appropriations, because of the obvious fiscal character of the joint resolution, and then subsequently to the Committee on the Judiciary.

In the view of the Chair, because of the clear language of the Reorganization Act, the Chair has no authority to refer the joint resolution anywhere except to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Chair therefore suggests to the able Senator from Maryland that if the other procedure is desired, he submit a unanimous-consent request for that purpose.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I think the ruling of the Chair is absolutely correct. In view of the fiscal character of the joint resolution, I ask unanimous consent that it be referred first to the Committee on Appropriations for preliminary examination and report, and thereafter be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for final action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 61) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to fiscal matters, introduced by Mr. TYDINGS (for himself and Mr. BRIDGES), was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN WAR EXCISE-TAX RATES—AMENDMENTS

Mr. BUTLER submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 1030) to continue in effect certain war excise-tax rates, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

MILEAGE AND OTHER TRAVEL ALLOWANCES OF MILITARY PERSONNEL

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, during the call of the calendar on Friday last the Senate considered and passed Senate bill 276, having to do with making the official mileage tables of the War Department apply to enlisted men as well as officers.

At the time of consideration of this bill I was asked by the Senators from North Dakota and Vermont whether the Comptroller General approved the measure, and I could not answer definitely at that time.

I now offer a letter of approval of the bill by the Comptroller General, dated February 7, and I ask that it be printed at this point in my remarks, so that the House of Representatives will know that the bill has been approved by the Comptroller General.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, February 7, 1947.

HON. CHAN GURNEY,
Chairman, Senate Committee on the Armed Services, United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: At your request, I have examined S. 276, Eightieth Congress, entitled "A bill to provide for payment and settlement of mileage and other travel allowance accounts of military personnel."

As introduced, the language of the bill is identical with that of S. 917 of the Seventy-ninth Congress, as to which, under date of March 21, 1946, I had occasion to furnish an analysis and report thereon to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, the report ending with the statement that I see no objection to the enactment and approval of S. 917. I am of the same opinion with respect to the current bill, S. 276.

Sincerely yours,
LINDSAY C. WARREN,
Comptroller General of the United States.

DECISION OF JUDGE PICARD IN THE MOUNT CLEMENS PORTAL-PAY CASE

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, when the decision was handed down by Judge Picard regarding the portal pay case I issued a statement in which, among other things, I said that I thought it important that the legislative branch of the Government should lay down its policy in no uncertain terms. I ask that the statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

According to the news dispatch, Judge Picard has dismissed the Mount Clemens portal-pay case on the de minimis theory, holding in substance that in this particular case there is no ground for recovery.

According to the news dispatch, the judge says that the industry should not be held liable for payment in suits arising before last June 10. It was then for the first time that the Supreme Court outlined the portal-pay theory. It will be interesting reading to see Judge Picard's complete decision. The case will undoubtedly be appealed to the Supreme Court, where the whole matter will be clarified.

In the meanwhile, it is my personal view that there should be no hesitancy on the part of the legislative branch of government to define its position. Such a definition might well help the Supreme Court in disposing of the whole matter and doing away with the unsettled condition resulting from the Supreme Court's own decision. This unsettled condition does not make for the economic health of the country.

It should be borne in mind that if the lower court's decision stands, it is simply a decision on the facts in this particular case. This is an added reason why the legislature should redefine its position in no uncertain terms on the general issue of portal-to-portal pay.

FORMULA FOR RECIPROCAL TRADE TREATY PROGRAM—JOINT STATEMENT BY SENATORS VANDENBERG AND MILLIKIN

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD following my remarks a joint statement by the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and myself as chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance, having to do with the Reciprocal Trade Act.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JOINT STATEMENT BY SENATOR VANDENBERG, CHAIRMAN OF THE SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE, AND BY SENATOR MILLIKIN, CHAIRMAN OF THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE

Because of our mutual interest in the foreign and domestic aspects of the forthcoming trade-agreements negotiations we have held a number of conversations on the subject. These and the discussions later referred to with Under Secretary of State Acheson and Under Secretary of State Clayton have been entirely on our own responsibility and solely for preliminary exploration on the subject. It is understood that the proposals are tentative and subject to revision in the light of developments.

Although we are conscious of differences of opinion between us as to some of the philosophy and procedures of the reciprocal-trade system, we are in accord on the following:

1. Since under existing law the Reciprocal Trade Act, as last extended by the Congress, does not expire until June 12, 1948, important basic changes in the system, if these should be needed, can be made more appropriately by the next session of this Congress. Moreover, pursuant to the authority vested in it by the Reciprocal Trade Act which, as above pointed out, does not expire until June 1948, the State Department has invited 18 nations to bargain with us this coming April for trade agreements; that elaborate plans for the negotiations have been made by the nations involved; that our own domestic hearings have been under way; that from the standpoint of our foreign relations it is undesirable that these plans be abandoned or needlessly postponed.

2. There is considerable sentiment for procedural improvements leading to more certain assurance that our domestic economy will not be imperiled by tariff reductions and concessions. The desire for procedural improvements arises from fears such as the following:

(a) That our proper domestic concern in tariffs adequate to safeguard our domestic economy may be subordinated to extraneous and overvalued diplomatic objectives.

(b) That our domestic interests which require protection against injurious imports or the threat thereof are not given proper hearings on proposed tariff cuts.

(c) That the exact reductions and concessions contemplated are kept secret and it is impossible to make specific defensive arguments against unspecified perils.

(d) That the whole matter is surrounded with unnecessary secrecy.

(e) That responsibility for advice to the President against injurious tariff reductions and concessions is unduly diluted and obscured among too many executive agencies and is not sufficiently focused on those best able to give it.

(f) That we do not get sufficient return benefit from the generalized benefits resulting to other nations from the operation of the unconditional most-favored-nation clauses in our trade agreements.

3. That under the Tariff Act of 1930 and the amending Reciprocal Trade Act there is ample authority for establishment of procedures by the President, without further legislation, that will safeguard the domestic economy without hampering the negotiation of agreements to encourage the essential expansion of our foreign trade.

4. That to the extent such executive safeguards are provided, claims for legislative action are obviated.

5. We believe that the following measures which may be put into effect by the President out of his existing powers would afford improved safeguards and would, without damage to legitimate reciprocal trade negotiations, allay many of the fears that have been mentioned:

(a) The United States Tariff Commission to review all contemplated tariff reductions and concessions in all future trade agreements and to make direct recommendation to the President as to the point beyond which reductions and concessions cannot be made without injury to the domestic economy.

(b) Inclusion of "escape clause" in every trade agreement hereafter entered into or renewed whereby the United States, on the initiative of the President, can withdraw or modify any tariff reduction or concession if in practice it develops that such reduction or concession has imperiled any affected domestic interest.

(c) The Tariff Commission to keep closely and currently informed on the operation of all of our trade agreements and on its own motion or on the request of the President or of the Congress, or of any aggrieved party, to hold public hearings to determine whether in its opinion any particular escape clause should be invoked, and to recommend direct to the President withdrawal or modification of any rate or concession which imperils any affected domestic interest.

(d) Recommendations of Tariff Commission to President for withdrawal or modification of rates or concessions under operation of "escape clause," together with any dissenting opinions of members and nonconfidential supporting data to be open to public inspection.

(e) Efficient procedures and policies to assure that nations which do not make available to us their own tariff reductions and concessions to other nations shall not receive generalized benefits from us resulting from the inclusion in our own trade agreements of the unconditional most-favored-nation clauses except at our option exercised in the public interest.

6. We have discussed these matters with Under Secretary of State Acheson and Under Secretary of State Clayton and are encouraged to hope that improvements by Executive order along the lines suggested will be seriously considered by the President and the State Department.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I rise to endorse enthusiastically the statesmanship of our colleagues, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], in having recently developed in collaboration with the State Department a sound and what I hope may be an entirely acceptable formula for dealing with the subject of reciprocal trade treaties at the coming international Economic Conference.

I have consistently taken the position during my membership in the United States Senate that the United States must take a positive, aggressive position of leadership in all measures that may look toward international collaboration for the preservation of the future peace. And in this connection I have felt the vital necessity, not only of political collaboration, but economic collaboration.

I am aware, Mr. President, that the question of economic collaboration presents many controversial issues, and that there are those in my own party in both House and Senate who are not in entire agreement on this subject; in fact there was danger there might be a real split in our party over the whole matter of the tariff policy and international trade.

It therefore has been most gratifying to me at a moment when I feel we need a united American front in our international approach, and when we should bend every effort to prevent divisiveness, either in our party or the Nation as a whole, that we should have such statesmanship and leadership as has been given by our two distinguished colleagues.

Mr. President, as a part of and following my remarks, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD three editorials, as follows: editorial from the New York Times of February 1, entitled "Republicans and Reciprocity"; editorial from the New York Herald Tribune of February 8, entitled "The New Tariff Formula," and editorial from the Washington Post of February 8, entitled "Trade Treaties."

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of February 1, 1947]

REPUBLICANS AND RECIPROCITY

Concluding the hearings which it has held in recent weeks, the Committee for Reciprocity Information will inform the State Department that the pressure for high tariffs is noticeably less today than it was in 1938, when similar hearings were held. There are various reasons, in our judgment, why this should be true. Since 1938 the United States has come a long way out of its political isolation, and in that process it must have shed some of its economic isolation too. Again, more people certainly know today than knew in 1938 how valuable foreign markets are to us and how inexorably true it is that we cannot sell in those markets unless we buy in them as well. Finally, the reciprocal trade agreements program itself has been managed so well and so wisely—in its formative stages under the deeply interested personal direction of Cordell Hull—that many business and agricultural interests which originally opposed the plan, or looked upon its possible benefits with skepticism, have been won over to its support.

There is, in fact, a great deal of popular and professional backing for the program which Mr. Hull initiated 12 years ago. The problem is how to demonstrate this fact, and the advantages of the program, to the Republican Members of Congress, a majority of whom voted against the Hull plan when it was first proposed and then voted against it every time it came up subsequently for extension except in the war year 1943.

It is curious that this should be the case, for historically it is the Republicans, and not the Democrats, who are the party of reciprocity. Look at the record. It was a Republican Secretary of State, James G. Blaine, who championed reciprocity as early as 1890 as a means of opening Latin-American markets to United States farm products. The principle of reciprocity was endorsed in national Republican platforms from 1892 to 1904 and was given practical application in the Republican Tariff Acts of 1890 and 1897. In the last speech of his career, a Republican President, William McKinley, declared that "reciprocal trade arrangements with other nations should in liberal spirit be carefully cultivated and promoted." This passage of that long-ago address in Buffalo is as timely today as when it was first spoken:

"A system which provides a mutual exchange of commodities is manifestly essential to the continued and healthful growth of our export trade. We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. If such a thing were possible, it would not be best for us or for those with whom we shall deal. We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor. Reciprocity is the mutual outgrowth of our wonderful industrial development under the domestic policy now firmly established."

It is only in comparatively recent years, and then apparently for one reason because it was the Democrats who happened to rediscover the idea, that the Republicans have swung over to the role of opposition on this issue. But there is no good reason why they should continue to constitute the opposition and many good reasons why they should return to their earlier role, now that they have taken over authority in Congress. Powerful among the reasons is the necessity of strengthening the economic position of those countries which believe with us in the advantages of the free-enterprise system. Equally powerful is the fact that the Republican Party professes to be the party of expanding production and the enemy of that governmental regimentation which is the logical alternative to an economy of abundance.

One Republican attack in the Senate this week on the Hull trade programs has already done considerable mischief. The country is entitled to look to the responsible Republican leadership of both Houses for assurance that the bipartisan agreement in foreign policy which has been achieved so successfully on political questions will be extended into the economic field as well.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of February 8, 1947]

THE NEW TARIFF FORMULA

Senators VANDENBERG, of Michigan, and MILLIKIN, of Colorado, appear to us to have made a very practical and, let us hope, effective contribution to the tariff controversy dividing the Republicans in Congress. Senator VANDENBERG has been a consistent supporter of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, the legislative father of the so-called Hull treaties. Senator MILLIKIN, on the other hand, has vigorously opposed the Hull program in the past. Yet here they are together proposing a compromise with the object of staving off any drastic changes in the program. It seems to us a statesmanlike move.

Renewal of the Reciprocal Trade Act last summer appealed to us at the time as an essential symbol of this country's intention to carry out its pledge to promote multilateral international commerce and thus to discourage the trade wars growing out of embargoes, quotas, and other restrictions which were an important factor in provoking World War II. Today this act still remains, under the circumstances, more of a guaranty of our pledge than a powerful instrument in achieving its purpose. The reasons are obvious. As the postwar world has developed politically we find ourselves one of the few remaining refuges of free enterprise, faced with totalitarian and collectivist economies with authoritarian control of their exports and imports. The interchange of goods with them, therefore, on any basis approaching the free play of supply and demand without injury to our own economy becomes a problem.

Under existing law the State Department, which has the trade treaties in charge, may cut existing tariffs as much as 50 percent in return for concessions from other nations. Thanks to the most-favored-nation clause in these treaties, these cuts extend to the goods of still other nations as well. Messrs. VANDENBERG and MILLIKIN have proposed that on recommendation from the Tariff Commission the President be apprised of "the point beyond which reduction and concession cannot be made without injury to the domestic economy," and that in every future trade agreement he be empowered to withdraw or modify any tariff order "if in practice it develops that such reduction or concession has imperiled any affected domestic interest." A third proposal is that nations which do not offer reciprocal benefits shall not share in those we would otherwise advance them through unconditional interpretation of the most-favored-nation clause.

Let us admit that compromises are rarely an ideal solution of problems and that this one is no exception. One is reminded, for instance, that when Great Britain occupied the position the United States does today, that of the great creditor nation of the world, she prospered mightily on a free-trade policy of her own though surrounded by high-tariff customers. This is no plea that we should emulate this historic example (the international economic picture is a very different one today). Yet the precedent does suggest that, as the greatest market for imports and the greatest source of desperately required exports, we need not be too timid in the assertion of a generous policy even vis-à-vis our collectivist customers.

[From the Washington Post of February 8, 1947]

TRADE TREATIES

We are now witnessing a demonstration of responsibility on the part of two Republican leaders, Senators VANDENBERG and MILLIKIN, who, after consulting with the State Department, have worked out a compromise plan designed to propitiate extremists in their own party who would like to wreck the reciprocal trade program. In our opinion, the procedural changes they suggest would afford protection against possible errors of judgment on the part of representatives of the State Department without hampering the execution of the program itself.

The recommended insertion of a so-called escape clause in trade agreements that would enable either party to withdraw or modify a tariff cut that caused undue hardship is only a reasonable precaution. The further suggestion that the Tariff Commission be directed to review all contemplated reductions and concessions and tell the President which ones cannot be made without injury to the domestic economy is likewise desirable. For it would afford the industries concerned opportunities for airing their grievances before a bipartisan agency of the Government that, unlike the State Department, has no political interest in the outcome of trade negotiations. The recommendation to tighten up procedures so as to deny the general trade benefits accruing to other nations under the most-favored-nation clause to countries that do not fully reciprocate is advice that the State Department cannot afford to ignore.

Some such concessions will have to be made by the State Department in order to save the essential features of its program and enable the United States to play the dominant role assigned to it in the forthcoming world trade conference. Failure of that conference would not only be a retrograde step, economically speaking; it might, and probably would, thwart bipartisan efforts to eliminate causes of international political friction and lay the foundation for world peace. For one, the most formidable causes of political friction among nations grows out of trade obstructions such as high tariffs, restrictive-quota provisions, and discriminatory regulations. Removal of such obstacles to freer trading is quite feasible without sacrifice of legitimate American interests. Moreover, concessions on our part will be reciprocated; our trade program is not a philanthropic plan of action for the bestowal of benefits without a quid pro quo.

In our opinion, therefore, Senators VANDENBERG and MILLIKIN have done a signal service for their party by their efforts to halt the drive against the reciprocal trade program. For if tariff making should ever again become the sport of Congressmen, we can be sure that trade barriers would rise higher and higher as the result of logrolling tactics. We should stand discredited before the world for going back on our professions of liberal trading principles. And Congress itself, and the Republicans in particular, would be rent by internal dissensions that would have repercussions at the next general election.

INTERNATIONAL CARTELS AND ATOMIC ENERGY

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, this is a time when we are just getting started on our program of control and development of atomic energy through the Atomic Energy Commission. It is a time when this subject is provoking much discussion in the international field. For these reasons I should like to call to the attention of the Senate an important statement which brings up yet another feature of the subject.

It is contained in a book by Mr. Darel McConkey, entitled "Out of Your Pocket: The Story of Cartels," published today.

The book is a synthesis of cartel information which lifts drama and intrigue from the acres of documents and converts them into a readable story. The most ominous section of the book is its closing chapter. The author warns that if ever the technique of world control to stifle individual competition—the cartel—is applied to atomic energy we may as well forget all about democracy.

Because I think that warning is so timely, so awesome, and so significant, I ask unanimous consent that a short passage from it be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks so that all the Members of this body may study it.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WARNING—WATCH OUT FOR AN ATOM CARTEL

It hasn't come out in the open very far yet, but there are unmistakable indications of a desire to form a cartel in atomic power. If that ever comes, God help us.

After World War I the dangers of a cartel in dyestuffs were foreseen and pointed out. Dyestuffs are beneficent materials, except when they are used to make explosives. But the thing slipped out of control, the cartel was formed, and the explosives exploded.

The atom bomb can be tamed and turned into beneficent energy that will benefit everybody. What is going to happen to it?

The Governments of the United States, Great Britain, and Canada are supposed to have "substantial patent control" over atomic power. Yet the UP reports a French scientist in May 1946 asked for the issue of a Swedish patent on it.

German physicists, according to newspaper reports, seem to have evaporated from the occupied homeland. Where are they? What are they up to? Are they in Spain? Are they in Argentina?

The State Department's Blue Book on Argentina says that "the industries essential to warfare in which experimentation in the weapons of future wars may take place and in which prototypes may be developed exist in Argentina and are controlled by Germans."

Here at home it is the big corporations that run the atom plants—du Pont, Monsanto Chemical, Westinghouse, Allis Chalmers, Union Carbide & Carbon, Eastman, Chrysler, General Electric.

Edison Electric Institute, representing the $16,000,000,000 utilities industry, says a newspaper account, "pleaded to be allowed to get in on atomic development."

A representative of General Electric, according to the same source, argues that private industry is "the logical agency to push atomic development."

The National Association of Manufacturers, in a special pleading for "our system of private initiative and free enterprise," has been working to kill off the antimonopoly provisions of the McMahon bill on atomic energy.

If atomic energy is ever turned into a cartel, there will be an immediate alliance between the cartel and the military, exactly as it happened with I. G. and the Nazis. Then we will have "one world" pronto—one world of slavery. The threat of immediate disintegration by atom bomb will hang over the head of any rebel group, no matter how large or small.

Cartels have got to be controlled fast before that can happen here.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The routine morning business is closed. The calendar under rule VIII is in order. The clerk will state the bills on the calendar.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 27) to provide for suspending the enforcement of certain obligations against the operators of gold and silver mines who are forced to cease operations because of the war, was announced as first in order.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, there has been opposition heretofore voiced to consideration of this particular measure. I know nothing about the matters involved, but, in view of the fact that opposition has heretofore been announced, I think the bill should go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will be passed over.

COLLECTION OF CERTAIN SPECIAL TONNAGE DUTIES

The bill (S. 132) to relieve collectors of customs of liability for failure to collect certain special tonnage duties and light money, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no collector of customs shall be held liable to the United States for his failure to collect special tonnage duties provided for in the first sentence of section 4219 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., 1940 ed., title 46, sec. 121), nor for his failure in connection therewith to collect light money provided for in section 4225 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., 1940 ed., title 46, sec. 128), in connection with the entry from a foreign port of any foreign vessel prior to October 1, 1940; nor shall any such vessel hereafter be held liable for the payment of any such special tonnage duties or light money in connection with any entry prior to October 1, 1940.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 1030) to continue in effect certain war excise-tax rates, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I think that measure should go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard, and the bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 1353) to amend the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon requests an explanation of the bill.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN] is temporarily absent from the Senate Chamber, I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

That completes the calendar.

HEARING BY SENATE SECTION OF JOINT ATOMIC ENERGY COMMITTEE

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, the Senate section of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy has a definite program for today in connection with the hearing on the nominations to the Joint Commission on Atomic Energy now being considered by that committee. Certain witnesses are to appear before us this afternoon, and much as I regret to be obliged to make the request, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate section of the committee may sit this afternoon while the Senate is in session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Iowa? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

CONFIRMATION OF ARMY NOMINATIONS

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I now ask advice of the Senate as to whether there should be incurred the expense of having routine nominations reported from the Armed Services Committee printed in the Executive Calendar.

The cost of printing the list of nominations will be considerable, for it contains 1,850 names, possibly comprising 10 or 12 pages. The only way to avoid printing the list of names in the Executive Calendar, at a cost of from $600 to $800, is to have the nominations confirmed by the Senate on the day on which they are reported from the committee, which is not in accord with the rule of the Senate. In other words, under the Senate rule, the nominations should be reported and placed on the calendar, and not acted upon by the Senate before the following day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair inquire of the Senator what is the top grade in the list of nominations?

Mr. GURNEY. The nominations are those of majors, captains, and lieutenants. The present list, 1,850 in number, is part of the 25,000 Regular Army officers who were authorized last year. The nominations have been approved unanimously by the committee, after having been held in committee for thorough consideration for a period, I believe, of about 2 weeks. As in executive session, from the Committee on Armed Services, I now report favorably the nominations, and ask unanimous consent for their immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota that the rule be suspended, so that there may be immediate consideration by the Senate of a list of nominations for promotion in the Army, in subordinate grades?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object in this particular instance—I think it is important that we should not, through a multiplication of individual waivers of the rules of the Senate, entirely dissipate the effect and purpose—and, I think, the sound purpose—of the rule requiring nominations to lie over for a day. We can carry this procedure so far that matters will move directly from the committees to the floor of the Senate without reaching the calendar at all, and I think that such an evil ought to be avoided. But I voice no objection to a particular request that is made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota? The Chair hears none, and, as in executive session, the nominations in the Army today reported favorably from the Committee on Armed Services are confirmed.

FOREIGN SURPLUS PROPERTY DISPOSAL

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, about 10 days ago there was filed with the Congress a report on foreign surplus disposal by the office of the Foreign Liquidation Commissioner of the Department of State. I desire to make a few observations on that report.

About a year ago, I served on a subcommittee of the Special Senate Committee Investigating the National Defense Program together with the then Senator from Delaware, Senator Tunnell, who acted as chairman of the subcommittee. Our assignment was to investigate the operations of various Government agencies overseas. The most outstanding of these, in my judgment, was the matter of the disposal of Government surplus property in foreign areas.

In 37 days the former Senator from Delaware and myself, together with the committee counsel, flew a total of 30,000 miles, conducted 32 public hearings and four executive hearings. We also accumulated a mass of statistical material not only during the course of the hearings but as a result of a letter dispatched in advance to the appropriate officials indicating the subject matter on which we wished to be informed.

Subsequent to that field investigation, the committee conducted hearings both executive and public, in Washington on the matter of surplus-property disposal abroad and also accumulated information through the activities of the staff.

The committee accepted the report of the subcommittee and filed with the Senate Report No. 110, part 5, on March 22, 1946, entitled "Investigations Overseas—Surplus Property Abroad."

In accordance with the committee's practice, the committee continued to follow the disposal of surplus property abroad and has held public hearings and executive hearings and has continued its staff investigation.

Mr. President, from my own personal familiarity with the subject gained as I have indicated, and from my knowledge of the work in this field which has been done by the Special Senate Committee Investigating the National Defense Program, it is my judgment that the report filed by the Office of the Foreign Liquidation Commissioner to which I have referred, demonstrates concretely the fallacy of accepting documents prepared by executive departments without any independent check by the Congress itself.

Moreover, the presentation of this report, in the light of the limitation imposed upon the Special Committee Investigating the National Defense Program in Senate Resolution 46, adopted on January 22, 1947, raises in my mind a major question of importance to the public; namely, who will now take the responsibility and perform the duty to the public of ascertaining the truth with respect to the handling of our Government surplus property located in foreign areas and inform the people of America about an important phase of the public business?

Mr. President, I do not propose to consume the time of the Senate by a detailed analysis of the report on foreign surplus disposal submitted by the Foreign Liquidation Commissioner. I will state, however, that the facts known to the Special Committee Investigating the National Defense Program raised in my mind a very grave doubt of the value of reports to Congress of the character of the one on foreign surplus disposal.

In my judgment this report falls far short of making public the information to which the Congress and the people are entitled. On the other hand, it is so drafted and worded as to conceal the true situation and to present the work of the Foreign Liquidation Commissioner in a very favorable light. If public judgments are to be based upon misleading and colored presentations of facts, then how can we expect wise and sound decisions to be made by the people under our democratic form of government?

Excellent as the press of our country is and free as it is from control by Government officials, the press does not possess the power of subpena and cannot administer oaths. Therefore, unless a congressional committee possessing those two important powers is authorized to explore a subject and diligently exercises that authority, the Congress and the people will be confined to the acceptance of statements made by the agencies themselves as to their discharge of the public trust. Human nature being what it is, either in government or out, we cannot expect public officials to report unfavorably on themselves.

The report discloses that $8,800,000,000 worth of United States property had been declared surplus up to the end of last year and that it is expected that approximately $2,000,000,000 more will be declared surplus in the future.

These figures add up to nearly $11,000,000,000 worth of Government property. Even in a day when we speak glibly of billions, this is no mean segment of the public business.

The report claims that out of $6,803,995,000 worth of sales there has been a realization of $1,589,558,000 to the United States.

On the surface, it would appear that up to the end of last year we had disposed of 80 percent of all surplus property which had been so declared abroad, at a return to the United States of approximately 23.3 cents on the dollar of original cost.

Unless we have information on market conditions in the areas where our surplus property was sold, and unless we look more closely at the benefits to the United States, which are lumped under the heading of "Realization," we mignt be inclined to the conclusion that an excellent job of merchandising had been rapidly accomplished by the Foreign Liquidation Commissioner. It is obviously that impression which the report is designed to convey.

Unless some agency of the Congress takes up where the Special Committee Investigating the National Defense Program left off on January 22, 1947, that record is likely to stand as the public record of our foreign surplus disposal.

In my judgment, that record is misleading and inaccurate and ought not to be permitted to stand. I merely wish to call attention to two or three specific aspects of this 52-page report on $11,000,000,000 worth of Government property which indicates to me that the Congress will not have discharged its responsibility to the people if it permits this record to go unchallenged.

Appendix I on page 40 of the report indicates that a total of $5,114,000,000 worth of surplus at original cost was sold to 10 foreign governments for a total realization of $958,000,000, a return of 18.73 cents on a dollar of original cost. The same table reveals that the first bulk sale was made to the United Kingdom on December 6, 1945, and totaled $588,000,000 of property at original cost, for a realization of $60,000,000, a return of 10.2 cents on a dollar of original cost.

Because the British bulk sale was the first one, and in the judgment of the committee might constitute a precedent in subsequent bulk sales to foreign governments, the committee explored its terms and the manner in which it was negotiated in some detail. The committee believed that our Government might be charged with discrimination in case it subsequently refused to give other governments as good a deal as we gave the British. Our investigation substantiated this view; and in my judgment the British bulk sale had a very important bearing on subsequent disposals in bulk to other governments.

The committee differed substantially with the Foreign Liquidation Commissioner's office as well as the Secretary of State as to the proper way in which to present the features of the British bulk sale to the public.

The Foreign Liquidation Commissioner, at the committee's hearing held on Friday, February 22, 1946, testified that under the agreement dated December 6, 1945, we were transferring to the British approximately $350,000,000 worth of United States Government surplus property, valued at original cost, in exchange for $60,000,000, representing a return to this Government of slightly less than 17.50 cents on a dollar of original cost.

From the report which I have referred to, it now appears that, instead of $350,000,000 worth of property, we have transferred to the British $588,000,000 worth of property, or $238,000,000 more than was contemplated. It also appears that for this extra $238,000,000 worth of property we have received not one additional cent. The result of this transaction is that we have sold our surplus to the United Kingdom for approximately 10 cents on the dollar.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from California is giving a very pertinent and timely talk about the disposal of war surplus property. I know that he traveled to some extent in foreign countries during the war, as I had the privilege of doing. I ask the Senator if it is not a fact that much of the property which the United States owned and which was in foreign countries could not be profitably returned to the United States because of the expense involved and because of the difficulty of finding a market when it was returned. I respectfully suggest to him, without taking issue with his figures, that quite often it was my own experience in traveling around the world last year and looking over Army and Navy establishments and talking with the men in control of those establishments, that after a careful survey it was found that it would cost more to return the property to the United States than could be realized from it if it were returned.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I intend to discuss that phase of the situation later.

The committee did not accept the figures given by the Foreign Liquidation Commissioner. One reason for not accepting the figures submitted was because they failed to include any valuation for many items that were to be transferred and which, from the committee's investigation, had provable value. For example, no valuation had been placed upon scrap, of which the Army had theretofore sold on a spot cash basis sufficient amounts for a cash return, paid at once, of nearly $3,000,000. The bulk sale included the transfer of scrap which was estimated by Army authorities to be substantially more than the amounts of scrap which the Army had already sold. If this scrap were valued at the same rate as that which the Army had sold, it should bring a return on a spot cash sale of nearly $12,000,000.

The Foreign Liquidation Commissioner either had given no attention whatever to the value of scrap to be included in the bulk sale, or if he gave it attention, had operated on the assumption that it was of no value, because, according to his testimony before the committee, he placed no valuation upon it in his negotiations.

Mr. President, my question is, Was the Foreign Liquidation Commissioner $238,000,000 off in his estimate of the property that was to be transferred to the United Kingdom; and did he enter into an agreement that whether we transferred $350,000,000 worth of property or twice that amount, the United States was still to receive no more in return?

In my opinion, this instance alone raises a very grave question as to the businesslike handling of foreign surplus disposal and somewhat impairs the impression which would be conveyed by the report received by Congress that our foreign property had been handled expeditiously and in a businesslike manner.

Mr. President, I also believe that the term "realization" or "sales price," as used in this report, should be examined in some detail to see precisely what realization the United States Government has actually received and what it may expect to receive in the future. The impression conveyed is that we have received in cash United States dollars a little more than 23 cents for every dollar's worth of property we have sold abroad. However, in the case of the British sale, the payments are to be made under the terms of the British loan agreement. In other words, the United Kingdom does not start paying until 1951 and will not complete payment until 2001 A. D. The interest rate is 2 percent, with a provision that the interest will be waived in any year if certain conditions exist; and, if waived, it would not accumulate.

In connection with the British bulk sale I was interested in noting on page 18 of the report that the United States has the option of taking up to the equivalent of $50,000,000 of the $60,000,000 the United Kingdom owes us on this sale in pounds sterling, if the option is exercised before December 31, 1951. It seems to me that the Senate would do well to keep itself advised as to whether our executive department officials have any plans for exercising this option, and in the event there is a move in this direction to go into the reasons behind it.

A second example of what is meant by realization is in the bulk sale to China, concerning which the National Defense Committee heard testimony on Friday, September 27, 1946. At that time Maj. Gen. Donald H. Connolly, Foreign Liquidation Commissioner, and Mr. Chester Lane, Deputy Foreign Liquidation Commissioner, described very briefly the bulk sale to China.

In the table set forth in appendix I to the Foreign Liquidation Commissioner's report the sale to China is shown as $837,000,000 worth of surplus at original cost, being sold for $175,000,000 realization or sales price. The testimony before the National Defense Committee disclosed that this $175,000,000 is really not $175,000,000 in United States currency, but is composed of three items: First, a credit of $35,000,000 to be expended by the United States for the purchase of real estate or for defraying United States governmental expenses in China; second, a credit of $20,000,000 for the cultural exchanges provided by the Fulbright Act; third, a $120,000,000 credit against the so-called Yuan debt, which is estimated to be approximately $150,000,000. The remaining $30,000,000 of the Yuan debt is to be paid by the United States through providing twenty-five million cash United States dollars for the purpose of providing transportation and other delivery services in transferring our surplus property from Pacific island bases to China, and five million cash United States dollars for the purpose of defraying fees of an engineering firm to supervise the packing and delivery of the property.

The indebtedness from the United States to China under the so-called Yuan agreement arises principally from two sources: First, the pay of United States troops located in China which had been paid in Chinese currency furnished by the Chinese Government; and, second, the payment for goods and services provided for the United States by the Chinese Government of the same character as those provided by others of our allies but furnished to us as reverse lend-lease.

For some reason, not fully explained in the committee's hearing, someone in our Government not clearly identified by the witnesses who testified, agreed to treat China in a manner different from the treatment accorded our other allies with respect to lend-lease and reverse lend-lease. Instead of offsetting what China furnished us against the lend-lease which we furnished them, we agreed to pay China in Chinese currency for the value of those services and goods.

At that hearing neither General Connolly nor Mr. Lane was able to give any accurate or reliable valuation of the indebtedness owed China by the United States in accordance with the Yuan agreement. They stated that this uncertainty arose from the fact that the Chinese currency was subject to such fluctuations that the valuation would depend upon the particular day selected to determine the exchange rate between American dollars and Chinese dollars. For example, General Connolly testified as follows in reply to a question by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] as to the value of the indebtedness at the time the bulk sale was concluded:

> We figured—that is, the Treasury—we figured it was worth one hundred and fifty million. I have heard some figures that the Chinese claimed it was worth two hundred and fifty million because they applied a different exchange rate than we did. Conservatively, our Treasury thought we owed them one hundred and fifty million.

It is significant to me that neither General Connolly nor Mr. Lane knew enough about the Yuan agreement, as the testimony before our committee discloses, to be able to state how much of the estimated $150,000,000 indebtedness arose from troop pay and how much was for services and supplies of the same character as those furnished to us by others of our allies as reverse lend-lease.

Mr. President, the Special Committee Investigating the National Defense Program only scratched the surface of the Chinese bulk sale. The committee has also conducted preliminary work in connection with the bulk sale to India, the bulk sale to France, the bulk sale to Italy, and the bulk sale to Belgium. In adddition, instances of sales made to private individuals have been brought to the attention of the committee which appear to have been handled in a very unbusinesslike manner.

On the field inspection trip to which I have referred, the former Senator from Delaware and I saw acres upon acres of construction machinery and equipment and motor vehicles, particularly in the Pacific. As everyone knows, construction machinery and building materials were in great demand in the United States at that time, and are still in great demand. We then urged, in January of 1946, that steps be taken immediately to return to the United States items in critically short civilian supply, for the dual purpose of obtaining dollars in exchange for those surpluses and for the purpose of speeding reconversion.

Our efforts resulted in the Director of War Mobilization and Reconversion, making some motions toward returning some of this critical material. At that time the Director of War Mobilization and Reconversion was Mr. John Snyder, now the Secretary of the Treasury. The steps taken, however, were wholly inadequate and the results obtained were negligible. We thought that the Director of War Mobilization and Reconversion should order the return of items in critically short supply. Instead of that, the Army and the Navy merely permitted their commanders in the Pacific to return whatever they desired to return, but furnished them with a list of items which were stated by the Civilian Production Administration to be critically needed in this country. We were assured by Mr. Snyder that this, in fact, would produce the desired results.

The committee checked this return of critical materials again in the fall of 1946, after the program had been ordered discontinued in July. The committee held hearings on the west coast and inspected the Lathrop Army engineers depot and the Port Hueneme naval depot in California, and the Mount Rainier and Auburn depots in the State of Washington. These were the locations on the west coast where the material returned from the Pacific was concentrated. The results were just what the committee had feared. Of the material which we needed in this country for our reconversion program, which every State and municipal organization responsible for road construction and every contractor and lumberman in the country wanted returned, very little actually arrived at our shores. Instead, we got old tents and tent poles, machinery from which parts had been removed, boxes containing a hodgepodge of unidentified material, and 25 carloads of impregnated shoes. The Army estimated that only 11 percent in tonnage of the surpluses returned were of items listed as critical in our civilian economy by the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. IVES in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. With regard to the item of impregnated shoes, as I recall, on the day we visited the depot, 25 carloads of shoe dubbing were being unloaded—not the shoes themselves, but material used in impregnating shoes. That was borne out further by the fact that we were told that prior to that time more than 400 barrels of the same material, amounting to about 60 tons had been received.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Which, so far as we know, has very little if any essential civilian use.

Mr. FERGUSON. That is correct. I wanted the RECORD to show that there were two items.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The former Senator from Delaware, Mr. Tunnell, on April 26, 1946, delivered a speech on the floor of this Chamber, criticizing in no uncertain terms the deficiencies and inadequate performance of our administrative agents in handling this problem of returning critically needed items to this country.

I say that the record has borne out the criticism which the then Senator from Delaware expressed. In my judgment, this chapter of our winding up of the war is one in which the action of our administrative agents is indefensible under any possible theory. The veteran who is unable to buy a tractor or a bulldozer or a truck; the highway department which is unable to get road scrapers and other road machinery; the lumberman whose capacity to produce badly needed lumber for housing is limited because of a lack of tractors and bulldozers; the contractor who is unable to obtain the necessary construction machinery; and the general public who suffers from the lack of housing because of the shortage of construction equipment, all are entitled to know the details concerning this inexcusable failure on the part of our administrative officials in disposing of Government-owned property abroad. If we leave it to the administrative agents to produce the facts, we shall never have them.

I do not wish to discuss at greater length the surplus disposal report of the Foreign Liquidation Commissioner, nor to labor my point that the report, as drafted, is what I would term a propaganda document which furnishes only some of the facts, in the light of which the agency itself wants the matter to be viewed. Total figures mean nothing unless we go behind them and see what they really stand for.

The Foreign Liquidation Commissioner not only is responsible for the sale of surplus property in the hands of our armed forces abroad, but likewise he is responsible for the sale of unconsumed lend-lease property. As is pointed out in a footnote on page 7 of the report, to which I have made reference, the termination and liquidation of lend-lease operations are reported separately to the Congress. The most recent report on this subject was filed with the Congress on January 3, 1947, and is printed as House Document No. 41. It is entitled "The Twenty-third Report of Lend-Lease Operations Under the Lend-Lease Act." The remarks which I have made with regard to the report on foreign surplus disposal are likewise applicable to the lend-lease report.

I wish to discuss for a few moments specifically some of the figures contained in this lend-lease report, and I desire to call attention to some of the omissions, which, in my judgment, are more significant than the information submitted.

During the war we furnished, under lend-lease to our allies, a total of $50,692,109,000 worth of supplies and services. Under the provisions of the Lend-Lease Act and the master agreements with our allies the title to all of this property remained in the United States Government.

In fighting the war, our allies used up a great deal of this lend-leased material. However, a great deal of what we have furnished to our allies on lend-lease was not used and, so far as I can see, remains just as much the property of the United States as the property which is in the hands of our armed forces in foreign areas. The only difference is that it is not in our possession, but is in the hands of our allies. The fact that this is United States property and that we have a right to sell it, as distinguished from the settlement of lend-lease credit balances in our favor, has been recognized in the settlements we have made with lend-lease countries.

For instance, in the lend-lease settlement made with Great Britain, lend-lease articles which had been consumed in fighting the enemy were treated in a different manner from the articles which remained in the hands of the United Kingdom at the end of the war. Testimony before the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program in February of 1946 disclosed that we had furnished a total of approximately $26,000,000,000 worth of lend-lease to the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom furnished to us in reverse lend-lease approximately $4,500,000,000 worth of goods and services. According to records furnished to our Government by the United Kingdom, at the end of the war a little over $5,500,000,000 worth of lend-lease articles remained unconsumed in the possession of the United Kingdom.

I think it should be noted parenthetically in passing that it is impossible to check the foregoing against the figures given in the twenty-third lend-lease report for the reason that that report does not give separate figures for the United Kingdom as to lend-lease we furnished, but has combined them with the total for the British Empire, showing $31,392,361,000. I do not charge that this failure to break down the lend-lease furnished to the British Empire, so as to show separately what was furnished to the United Kingdom and what was furnished to the various colonies and subdivisions of the British Empire, was done by design. I merely wish to point out that the information furnished is not such as would be satisfactory to anyone who desired to have more than a surface or cursory knowledge of our operations with respect to lend-lease.

Referring again to the figures furnished the committee a year ago, since they are the only ones we have for this purpose, we find that approximately $16,000,000,000 worth of lend-lease supplies furnished by the United States, in excess of the reverse lend-lease which we received from the United Kingdom was used up in fighting the enemy. The United States canceled this $16,000,000,000 as an indebtedness owing to our Government in exchange for an undertaking on the part of the United Kingdom to enter with other like-minded nations a trade conference designed to remove artificial restrictions on international trade.

The $5,500,000,000 worth of unconsumed lend-lease articles remaining in the possession of the United Kingdom were, for all practical purposes, transferred to the United Kingdom against an agreement on their part to pay us $472,000,000. The committee computed the percentage of cost of this return to be 8½ percent.

The report of the Foreign Liquidation Commissioner, in stating that $8,000,000,000 worth of surpluses had been declared abroad, does not take into account the unconsumed lend-lease supplies in the hands of our allies, the title to which remains in the United States Government.

Over a considerable period of time, the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program has sought to learn from the agencies responsible for the handling of lend-lease matters the approximate amount of lend-lease supplies in the hands of our allies, which remained unconsumed at the close of the war. The committee was never able to obtain even a good guess, except in the instance of the United Kingdom, where figures were furnished as developed by the British authorities themselves, subject only to the most superficial checking by United States officials. In the twenty-third lend-lease report there are no figures showing total inventory of unconsumed lend-lease articles. I wish to point out that report was filed more than 16 months after the end of the war. I think it is extremely significant that our agents do not seem to know even now how much United States property remains in the hands of our allies.

If we assume that the ratio of remaining unconsumed lend-lease to total lend-lease furnished, in the instance of the United Kingdom, is typical of all of our allies to whom we furnished lend-lease, it would appear that at the close of the war the United States Government owned, as unconsumed lend-lease, supplies in excess of $10,000,000,000 worth, the possession of all of which was in foreign governments.

By combining the total $11,000,000,000 worth of surplus property declared and expected to be declared surplus by our armed forces abroad and the estimated $10,000,000,000 worth of unconsumed supplies and matériel in the hands of our allies, we can see that the Foreign Liquidation Commissioner is responsible for approximately $21,000,000,000 worth of United States Government property located outside the jurisdiction of the United States. This is a sizable public asset, and the Congress and the public are entitled, not simply to total figures and descriptions in general terms, but to know the detailed facts regarding the management and stewardship of this public property. We are entitled to know whether the interests of our Government have been protected in a businesslike manner by the administrative agents in charge of this public responsibility.

Mr. President, lest the foregoing remarks be misconstrued, I desire to make it plain that I do not take any penny-pinching attitude toward the administration of our surplus property, our lend-lease credits, and unconsumed lend-leased United States property located in foreign areas at the end of the war. I do not minimize, nor did the committee, the difficulties involved in the disposal of United States property in foreign areas—the problem of custody and preservation, the problem of maintaining sales forces in foreign lands, the problem of dollar exchanges, and the problem of doing business under the laws of another sovereignty.

I take the position, and it is in full accord with the position taken by the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program that we should utilize our foreign surpluses in the accomplishment of programs in the national interest with broad authority in our administrative agents to accept intangible rights and benefits as well as tangible property other than United States dollars in exchange for the transfer of our surplus property.

What I am suggesting at this time is that now that the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program has been prevented from continuing its investigation in this field, the Senate must not permit that task to go undone, but on the other hand, must accept its responsibility to the people and must insist that an appropriate agency of the Senate continue to explore the manner in which our surplus property abroad is being disposed of, and to examine carefully the reports submitted by our administrative agents on that subject.

Mr. President, I do not care to engage in any jurisdictional controversy as to which committee of the Senate should pursue this matter. It appears to me that there are aspects of this subject which are within the field of the Armed Services Committee of the Senate. Furthermore, there certainly are aspects of it which touch upon the conduct of our foreign relations and are, therefore, within the purview of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate. The broad authority of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments would bring this subject clearly within the scope of inquiry of that committee. There also may be other committees that have an interest in this subject matter.

It is of no importance to me which of these committees or other committees which may claim jurisdiction, or even a special committee, if that should be necessary, shall perform the function of exploring this field and reporting to the Senate and the public. What does concern me is that we must make sure that the Reorganization Act, which I favored originally and which I now favor, is not used as a means of engaging in a jurisdictional controversy between Senate committees, with the result that no one performs a task which, under the circumstances, should be performed.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I did not care to interrupt the able Senator from California as he went along in his masterful analysis of the report on foreign surplus property disposal, but I wish to say that in my opinion he has rendered a real service to the Senate and to the people by calling this subject to our attention.

At this time I wish to advise the Senate that the junior Senator from Michigan has been named the chairman of a subcommittee which has been appointed by the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments to look into the question of surplus property, and the disposal of surplus property. I am sure the work that will be done by that subcommittee will not conflict with and I hope will not duplicate, the services of the other committee which may have jurisdiction of the same subject.

I think it is advisable to state at this time that it is the intention of the subcommittee to investigate in detail the entire surplus property problem, because I think it is one which, as the able Senator from California has indicated, deserves the very careful attention of the Senate, and should be analyzed so that in the future we may know exactly what has happened to this property.

The able Senator from California has not called attention to the fact that settlements have not been made as to lend-lease property, a situation which sometimes people forget. As has been ably stated, the title of the property is in the United States, and it seems somewhat strange that we have not pressed for a settlement of our accounts, because, as I view the situation, since the war is over, naturally various departments and agencies will shrink in size, and many of those who have had charge of such accounts will disappear from the Government service.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I am sure the Senator will bear me out in the statement that the largest item which has not been settled is the lend-lease item of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KNOWLAND. It is our understanding that, though a number of communications have gone from the Government of the United States to the Russian Government, we have not yet had the courtesy of a reply relative to the settlement of the eleven-billion-dollars-plus, lend-lease account. We know however, that there was some additional lend-lease material in the so-called pipe line. The normal interpretation would be that pipe-line items are those which might have been in the course of transit at the time lend-lease was terminated, but we have ascertained that is not the fact. The so-called pipe line includes items which had been in the blueprint stage, so to speak, and have since been manufactured, or even now are in the process of being manufactured. Of the $35,000,000 worth of lend-lease still in the so-called pipe line, approximately $25,000,000 worth is destined to go to the Russian Government, about seven million to the French Government, and the remainder scattered amongst various other governments. This after the American people had believed that lend-lease was terminated.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. I am laboring under the misfortune of having missed the major part of the address of the Senator from California. Was the Senator suggesting that any action be taken by the Senate, or was he merely expressing his views?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I had both expressed my views and had called attention to the fact that now that this matter is not under the jurisdiction of the War Investigating Committee some committee of the Senate—the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, the Foreign Relations Committee, or the Armed Services Committee—should go thoroughly into the matter.

Mr. PEPPER. I was going to make an inquiry as to whether this matter, which is essentially within the jurisdiction, I would assume, of the State Department, had been before the State Department, and whether General Marshall, the new Secretary of State, primarily in charge of the conduct of our foreign relations and the maintenance of our foreign policy, had made any recommendation about the subject, or given the Senator or the Senate his advice as to what our action should be. I was thinking that it is a matter relating to the relationship between this and another country, and probably the first opportunity for the expression of opinion and the suggestion of a policy should come from the Secretary of State, in whom we recently expressed such clear and bipartisan confidence, before we do anything in the Senate which might tend to impair the good relations between this and another country.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, the junior Senator from California had not suggested that the Senate take action at this time, but he believes that the Senate has a responsibility, which it cannot abdicate to any administrative agency of the Government, to gather the full facts, and one of the means of getting the full facts is through the regularly established committees of this body.

Mr. PEPPER. Will the Senator from Michigan yield again?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. Perhaps I am in error, but it has been my assumption that the primary responsibility for getting the facts about matters relating definitely to our foreign policy was vested by the Constitution and the laws of the country in the President and the Secretary of State. I know of no duty on the part of Congress to supersede the action of the President and the Secretary of State in getting information. Of course, if Congress desired to impute neglect to the President or the Secretary of State, and to charge, directly or indirectly, a violation of duty by the President or the Secretary of State, then, of course, the Congress would owe it to the people to undertake an inquiry, but I am wondering whether it is consistent with the bipartisan confidence we recently expressed in the new Secretary of State, who certainly has knowledge of these lend-lease matters, for us to assume to act, or start a Senate inquiry, unless we are willing by that action to impute a neglect of duty by the new Secretary of State.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think we might all ponder the report of the able Senator from California in looking for a solution of the difficult problem before us. I think he should be thanked for bringing out many of the facts about the matter. However, I do not think we should leave the subject without making it plain that the contracts which have been the subject of the colloquy between the Senator from California and the Senator from Florida were made by representatives of our State Department in a purely legal manner, that is, they had the authority to make the contracts. Whether the contracts are good or bad, or should have been made, I am not at the moment attempting to argue, but the fact is that the officials did have the authority, under the law, to make the contracts which were made, and the contracts do contain the provision "subject to the action of Congress," or words to that effect. So that nothing has been done, from the time the contracts expired until now, which cannot be undone. I do not think we should leave the impression in the public mind that the contracts were executed without authority of law, and that they did not contain a clause that the Congress might alter them if it saw fit to do so.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. I should like to add to what the able junior Senator from Michigan has said, that when I appointed a subcommittee of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, which will be headed by the junior Senator from Michigan, I felt that the subcommittee should not only examine or look into the disposal of surplus property but also into the use of all United States property wherever it might be found.

I realize that the Armed Services Committee has every right to examine into the operations abroad of the armed services; that the Foreign Relations Committee has every right to examine into the operations abroad of the State Department; and that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has the right to look into the operations abroad of the Department of Agriculture, if there be any such. Furthermore, there are independent agencies such as the Maritime Commission and others that are doing business abroad into whose operations the Armed Services Committee has every right to examine. But the authority given the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, which is being delegated to a subcommittee in this respect, cuts across all agency lines, and would give its subcommittee the right, if the members found it necessary so to do, to go abroad, to look into the manner in which the War Department, the Navy Department, the State Department, or any other department was utilizing the property under its jurisdiction or was expending funds.

I think we have no right to determine the policies of the State Department, or of the War Department; that is entirely outside our jurisdiction; but we do have a right to cut across departmental lines in examining the manner in which property is being used and in which money is being spent.

For that reason I felt that the able Senator from Michigan, who has had so much experience in the past, both at home and abroad, in investigating surplus property and other matters, as a member of the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program, was the ideal person to head this subcommittee. I feel sure that he, with his associates, will do a very effective job.

I simply want to make it clear that this subcommittee is not only expected to investigate the sale of surplus property but also the use of surplus property, determining whether some may be held that ought to be sold, to bring some increment to the United States Treasury.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, since this question has come up in connection with lend-lease, it seems that the able Senator from Florida, for instance, is greatly concerned lest the Senate in some way interfere with the State Department's relation with foreign governments in lend-lease matters; but, after all, be that as it may, I think the Senate of the United States, the body that receives reports from the Secretary of State in relation to lend-lease, should look into the question of what is being done with property belonging to the United States Government.

As I view the act, and as has been pointed out by the able Senator from California, title to that property, after lend-lease is terminated, or at the end of the war, is in the United States. The question whether it will ever become surplus property will depend upon the action of the Army and the Navy and various other agencies of the Government. If they act and declare it to be surplus, then it becomes surplus property, and whether it is to be disposed of by one agency or another concerns the Senate. I think that the Senate is interested in knowing whether our lend-lease accounts have been quickly settled, whether they have been settled by agencies which knew what the lend-lease problems were, or whether they are going to be settled within the memory of men who administered lend-lease both in foreign nations and here, rather than to be dragged out for months and even for years, without our knowing what kind of settlement will be made. So I think the Senate is interested and should understand the matter.

The Senate, through the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program, many months ago had under consideration the question of lend-lease and what was meant by the pipe line. When the facts are known I think it will be found, as the able Senator from California has said, that since VJ-day more than a billion dollars' worth of supplies have been furnished on lend-lease that were not within what was generally understood to be the "pipe line," or as constituting property which had already been manufactured. It was in the blueprint stage. So I think that the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments owes the duty, if it is to perform its function, of looking into the whole question of surplus property.

For instance, a few weeks ago the able Senator from California raised the question about the sale of certain property in France to a firm in Britain, which property had not been paid for in conformity with the rules and regulations governing lend-lease. I cannot recall the exact day that that point was raised, but I think the discussion on the Senate floor between the Senator from California and the Senator from Michigan brought some results; and I should like to read into the RECORD at this time a reply from the Department of State, Office of the Foreign Liquidation Commissioner, Washington, D. C., dated January 27, 1947, which was written after the discussion between the Senator from California and the Senator from Michigan took place. The letter reads:

JANUARY 27, 1947.

Mr. GEORGE MEADER,
Chief Counsel, Special Committee Investigating the National Defense Program, United States Senate.

DEAR MR. MEADER: This letter is intended to supply the committee with the latest information received in connection with the sales made to the firm of Gaylord Edwards & Co., Ltd.

Mr. Nicol of your committee had made a verbal request for information as to the number of theater shipping orders on the subject contracts which had been retained by OFLC in Paris. These copies totaled four signed and eight unsigned.

On January 15, 1947, Gaylord Edwards & Co., Ltd., and the North Central Waggon & Finance Co. made a payment of $1,200,966.50, representing full settlement at contract price for all tractors and scrapers removed from the United States Army depot in Belgium. It will be noted that this amount differs from the total of the amounts contained in the enclosure to our letter to the committee of January 11, 1947. We have been advised that the difference of $26,763.50 is a result of a duplication of tally-out forms on six tractors.

I trust that these developments will prove to be of interest to the committee.

Sincerely yours,

DONALD H. CONNOLLY,
Major General, United States Army,
Foreign Liquidation Commissioner.

So it is not merely the State Department that is involved. A Foreign Liquidation Commissioner is handling surplus property, and since the Special Committee to Investigate the National Defense Program has been limited in its jurisdiction, many questions cannot finally be determined or reported to the Senate by that committee. Some of them will come under the jurisdiction of other committees, and I agree with the able Senator from California that such committees should look into these problems and report on them to the Senate, so that we may have final action by committees of the Senate, and that none of the work heretofore done and money expended in examining into and developing the situation shall have been lost.

I may say—and I know the statement is made with the approval of the able chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments—that the committee will not neglect its duty but will pick up these various matters where they may have been left because of cutting off the jurisdiction of the Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program, and will proceed to look into the matters involved and, from time to time, report to the Senate.

LEGISLATIVE BUDGET PROGRAM THREATENS AMERICAN WAY OF LIFE

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I have been advised that the Committee on the Legislative Budget which, under the Congressional Reorganization Act, as the Senate knows, is composed of the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations of the House, and the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, will act next Friday, being the 14th of February, on the legislative budget. This committee, appointed under the terms of the reorganization law, assembled about the middle of January and appointed a subcommittee. No public hearings have been held by that subcommittee. I am given to understand that the subcommittee will meet tomorrow and will then determine what it proposes to do about the legislative budget.

Senators will recall that the Reorganization Act, in section 138 (a), requires the committee to make this report by February 15, and that paragraph (b) of section 138 of the act reads as follows:

> The report shall be accompanied by a concurrent resolution adopting such budget, and fixing the maximum amount to be appropriated for expenditure in such year.

That will be the fiscal year 1948.

> If the estimated expenditures exceed the estimated receipts, the concurrent resolution shall include a section substantially as follows: "That it is the sense of the Congress that the public debt shall be increased in an amount equal to the amount by which the estimated expenditures for the ensuing fiscal year exceed the estimated receipts, such amount being $——."

No one, Mr. President, can quarrel with the good sense of the establishment of a legislative budget in advance of action by the Congress upon appropriations and taxes in any fiscal year. It, however, is clear that since the Reorganization Act became effective only during the last Congress, that is to say in 1946, and since this Legislative Budget Committee was not appointed until less than a month ago, it is quite impossible for that committee to give due consideration to the tremendously important task which has been committed to it.

One reads in the daily press reports which indicate that despite the obvious impossibility of thorough study, the subcommittee in all probability will submit a report proposing to cut X billion dollars from the Executive budget, thereby making a limitation upon appropriations so that a tax reduction may be made by the Congress during the next year. We have head a great deal of talk about a 20-percent-across-the-board reduction of income taxes. It has not received, I understand, the complete approbation of all Members of the majority. Indeed, I was very happy to note in the newspapers last Saturday that the president of the Senate majority conference, the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], had announced, in effect, that he would not give his approval to any reduction of taxes prior to the 1st of July next. That is an indication of a comprehension of the fact that to reduce taxes now while the debt of the United States remains at the tremendous pinnacle it has reached, involves hazards almost beyond the imagination to our American way of life, as it is generally called.

Last night, Mr. President, I secured a copy of the annual report of the Treasury Department, the latest report. It is House Document No. 4 of the Eightieth Congress, first session. It contains two tables which are of the utmost importance, and I recommend them to the reading of the Members of this body and of the House, and particularly I recommend them to the members of the Committee on the Legislative Budget. They are tables 2 and 24.

Table 2 gives a full account of the receipts and expenditures and, more important, the interest on the public debt for every year from 1789 down through 1946.

Table 24 gives the principal of the public debt outstanding at the end of each fiscal year from 1853 to 1946.

I rise now, Mr. President, to call the attention of the Congress to these figures, because I know that there will be no opportunity for me as a member of the Appropriations Committee to call the attention of the Committee on the Legislative Budget to these facts until next Friday, the day before the legislative budget will be prepared.

MAGNITUDE OF THE NATIONAL DEBT

I venture to assert, Mr. President, that the members of the subcommittee who are reported in the press to be about to bring in a recommendation that the President's budget be cut by about five or six billion dollars so that there may be a reduction of income taxes have not given adequate attention to the public debt or to the interest upon the public debt. This debt was managed so superlatively during the war that few of us realized that the people of the United States today are carrying the heaviest debt that was ever incurred by any nation at any time in all the history of civilization. I say, Mr. President, that unless Congress gives attention to the magnitude of the debt and to the burden of the interest, which must be paid upon it every year, the whole basis of the capitalistic system may be in danger.

That, Mr. President, is not an extravagant statement when we consider the fact that what is going on in the world shows that only the United States of America still believes in the system of private property, that only this country believes that the capitalistic system can be made to work. We talk lightly of maintaining free competitive enterprise, but we absolutely ignore the fact that to maintain free enterprise we must pay the interest on the debt and make some effort to cut it down.

HOW MUCH IS FIVE BILLIONS?

The annual expenditure estimated in the budget to carry the national debt in the next fiscal year, Mr. President, is $5,000,000,000. Does anyone know what $5,000,000,000 is? I should like to measure it in terms of the cost of Congress, the cost of all the Federal courts, the cost of the executive offices of the President. The same budget which is going to be so airily reduced on the recommendation of the Joint Committee on the Legislative Budget carries a recommendation of an appropriation for the legislative branch of $68,489,429—millions of dollars, not billions. For all the courts of the United States, all the Federal judiciary, add a total expenditure of $19,194,900; an appropriation for the Office for Emergency Management of $379,730,000; and for general expenditures for the Office of the President of the United States, $6,232,750. Add them all together—the cost of Congress, the cost of the courts, and the cost of the executive offices of the President—and the sum is less than $500,000,000. Again I speak only in millions. The interest upon the national debt will be 10 times that amount. It will be five billions; that is to say five thousand millions.

Mr. President, if the interest upon the national debt is to be measured in terms of what the civil departments and agencies of government spent in the days before the war, it quickly appears that it is more than twice as much as the entire civil cost of government.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator would like another comparison. It costs every man, woman, and child in the United States $3 a month merely to pay the interest on the national debt.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is quite correct.

THE INTEREST IS AN ANNUAL CHARGE

Mr. President, it seems to me that we are not giving sufficient consideration to the fact that that charge is an annual charge, and that it will be continued year after year unless we reduce the national debt. What are we going to do about it? Are we going to make a reduction of taxes without reducing the national debt, or are we going to say, "We will make a reduction of income taxes which will benefit chiefly those in the higher brackets, who have made great profits out of the war and who are now making greater profits than they ever made before in peacetime, and a token reduction of the debt?"

Senators cannot read the tables found in the report of the Treasury Department without realizing that this country stands upon the brink, as other countries have stood and some have gone over, of totalitarianism or socialism.

I have taken some figures from the report of the Treasury which I think are of such importance that I shall read them into the RECORD. Let me say first that at the end of the First World War, on June 30, 1919, the national debt of the United States was $25,482,034,419. During the closing years of the administration of Woodrow Wilson, that is to say, during the fiscal year which ended June 30, 1920, and the fiscal year which ended June 30, 1921—it will be recalled that the administration did not change until the 4th of March, 1921—the World War I debt was reduced from the figure I have just given, $25,482,034,419, to $23,977,450,553. In other words, immediately after the peace treaty was signed the administration of Woodrow Wilson began to give its attention to the reduction of the debt. The same thing has been going on under the administration of President Truman. There has already been a total payment upon the World War II debt of approximately $20,000,000,000. The Treasury statement for February 6, 1947, now on the desk of every Senator, shows that the debt last Thursday was $259,166,241,554.69, as compared with $279,358,941,198.09 on February 6, 1946, a year ago.

The World War II debt almost reached $300,000,000,000 during the fiscal year 1946, but by reason of the fact that the administration was applying every dollar of surplus funds it could to the reduction of that debt, the total figure on June 30, 1946, had been reduced to $269,422,099,173. That was a per capita debt of $1,910.97 for every man, woman, and child in the United States.

COLD FIGURES ON THE DEBT

It is customary in these discussions of the debt and interest on the debt to speak as though the debt were the result of wasteful and extravagant spending by the Democratic administration. I do not deny that there was waste in the conduct of the war; I do not deny that there was extravagance; I do not deny that if time had been available it might have been possible to do the things that had to be done for less money than they cost; but the expenditures for the war were made with the full support of a unanimous Congress which was seeking to win the war as speedily as possible.

I invite the attention of Members of the Senate to what the cold figures show about the cost of the war in terms of debt, the cost of the depression in terms of debt, and to the debt which was left over when, in the beginning of 1933, there was a change of administration.

On June 30, 1933, about 3½ months after the termination of the administration of President Hoover, the national debt was $22,538,672,560. That was a reduction of $1,438,777,993 from the high point of the debt in 1921, when the Republican administration began. That was the total net reduction of the national debt during the last administration of the Republican Party, when it had complete control of the Congress and of the Executive, and when it followed the policy which is now proposed, of reducing taxes first and the debt afterward. There was a total net reduction of less than $1,500,000,000 between 1921 and 1933, a period of 12 years.

We talk about the private property system; we talk about capitalism; and we talk about a sound administration. There can be no sound fiscal administration unless we are willing to raise the money that is necessary to pay the interest upon the debt and retire some of the principal. If we are not willing, year after year after year, to take out of the earnings of the people $5,000,000,000 annually to pay the interest on the debt before we reduce taxes, then, Mr. President, beware of what is going to happen, because this Nation cannot again go through such an experience as the one it went through in the last 12 years of Republican administration, when the war debt of World War I was reduced by less than $1,500,000,000.

Let us now consider the cost of the depression in terms of national debt.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MORSE. Will the Senator from Wyoming permit the junior Senator from Oregon to point out that during those same 12 years of Republican administration, the American taxpayer also suffered a great money loss by reason of a depreciated dollar resulting from the great inflation that occurred because of the fiscal policies of the Republican Party.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Oregon has mentioned that fact, because it reminds me of another very great loss that was suffered during that same period. The holders of Government bonds suffered a great loss. The war bonds which were sold to individuals at 100 cents on the dollar, were in many instances sold by their owners at 85 cents on the dollar; and the difference between the 85 cents on the dollar which the small bondholder obtained and the par value was received by those with large incomes, whose taxes were reduced by a favorable administration.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Wyoming is making an outstanding contribution to the discussion of the fiscal affairs of the Government. Let me call his attention to the fact that in 1925, in Italy, shortly after Mussolini came into power, the Royal Italian Government, which was organized 66 years before, had for two-thirds of its existence operated the Italian Government with an unbalanced budget—in short, on borrowed money. The day of payment of the Italian debt was postponed by every succeeding administration which was elected by the people, until finally it became more and more difficult to borrow money because of the practice which was being followed. Finally, when the Government had to impose heavy taxes out of all proportion to the wealth of that nation, the Italian people awakened to the fact that they were the most heavily taxed people on the face of the earth; and it was the chaos, the barricades in the streets, and the economic confusion which resulted from that long-term unbalanced-budget policy, more than any other cause, which brought Mr. Mussolini to be the dictator over all the people of Italy. When we consider recent history in relation to that financial picture, we see what a terrific price the Italian people have paid, because of a condition which had its primary roots in the policy of operating the Government on borrowed money and not keeping its budget in balance in peacetime.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am very grateful to the Senator for having made that comparison. It is absolutely sound, and it points clearly to what will happen here unless we avoid the errors which were committed in Germany, in Italy, and in other countries; indeed, unless we avoid the error committed in the last Republican administration.

We cannot hope to maintain the capitalistic system, the system of private property and private competitive enterprise, unless we follow a policy deliberately calculated to maintain the Government bonds we have sold to the people.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the able Senator from Wyoming. I wonder whether he is really worried that the tax program as sponsored by Representative KNUTSON could pass the Senate. My own observation is that only a few Republican members here would subscribe to a straight 20-percent-tax reduction program.

ATTITUDE OF SENATORS ENCOURAGING

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I have observed with a great deal of encouragement the fact that a number of Senators like the distinguished Senator who has interrupted me and his colleague from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], have already indicated that they will have no part of the program of "cutting a melon" for the "big boys" at the top and letting the little fellows at the bottom bear the expense, while endangering the fiscal structure of our Government. I know that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] will not give his support to such a program. I am speaking now only because I know that many other Senators on the other side of the aisle and many Members of the House of Representatives view this matter just as the Senator from North Dakota and I view it. I desire to call the attention of the Members of this body and the attention of those who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to the cold facts—facts which are being neglected and overlooked solely because the debt was managed in a superlatively excellent manner during and since the war.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG. I think it is necessary first to exercise every economy in forthcoming appropriations, so as to make possible a substantial payment on the national debt. If then we can reduce the income tax, that will be the time to do it, but not at this time. When income-tax reductions are possible, first consideration should be given to the low-income groups. I commend the distinguished Senator from Wyoming for his able and timely tax discussion.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator's statement as to what should be done. Of course we should exercise every possible economy. Of course we should make recovery of every possible dollar that may be recovered in the sale of surplus property, for example, and in other fiscal matters. We should avoid waste and we should avoid extravagance. The danger we confront, I say to the Senator from North Dakota, is that the reductions of the budget will be made to fall upon those expenditures which although productive of income and of business, nevertheless are objected to by those who would be the beneficiaries of the tax-reduction program now being proposed.

There is, for example, the program of rural electrification to which the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] referred the other day. There is the program of public power in the Northwest to which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] referred. There is the program of reclamation in the West to which I have referred over and over again.

Mr. President, a reading of the list of the reclamation projects of the West will disclose that without exception they have created income because they have created business. They have been sound expenditures by the Federal Government and they have been productive of income to the Federal Government, as well as of repayment of the charges which have been levied against the farmers who settled upon the irrigation projects.

Mr. President, I was speaking of the costs of the depression in terms of debt.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I am sorry I have not heard all the Senator's remarks. It seemed to me when I entered the Chamber that the Senator was giving the comparative figures regarding the debt when the Republicans came into power in 1921 and the debt when President Roosevelt took over. However, I believe that in that connection the Senator did not present the corresponding data, as I recall them, for the period between 1921 and 1929. As I recall, there was a period of 9 or 10 years when the debt was diminished to the tune of approximately $1,000,000,000 a year, so that at the beginning of the depression the national indebtedness had been reduced about $10,000,000,000. Am I correct?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin is not quite correct. I was about to present those figures for the RECORD. I have them before me. They are as follows: On the 30th of June 1921, just after the change of administration, which occurred on the 4th of March 1921, the national debt was $23,977,450,553. As I pointed out a little while ago, it had been reduced by $1,504,000,000 by the previous Democratic administration. The low point on the national debt during the Republican regime was reached on the 30th of June 1930, when it was $16,185,309,831. If we subtract the debt on the 30th of June 1930, the lowest point of the debt under the Republican administration, from the debt which the Republican administration inherited from the Democrats in 1921, we find that the maximum reduction was $7,792,140,722. So I am happy that the Senator from Wisconsin has called attention to that fact, because it points to precisely what I wish to drive home, namely, that it was the policy of serving the big fellow instead of the small fellow that brought about the depression and caused the deficit expenditures of the closing years of the last Republican administration. The fiscal policies of that administration which some of the present Republican leaders want this Congress to imitate did not pay off the debt or bring prosperity.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. Is it not also a fact that during that period the taxes imposed upon the people were reduced, by means of a reduction in the tax rates?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes; and I am warning against doing it again, until the national debt is paid off or reasonably reduced.

Mr. WILEY. I understand the warning of the Senator from Wyoming; but a moment ago he made a statement to the effect that the depression was caused by the reduction of taxes and the reduction of the national debt.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, well, it was one of the causes.

Mr. WILEY. I am glad the Senator qualifies it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I say that what helped to cause that depression was the fact that we followed policies which were adopted without regard to the vital necessity, in a country governed by the people, of taking care of the people first, before taking care of those who are in the upper tax brackets and who are the controllers of our economic destiny.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. WILEY. Is it not also a fact that before the depression, although taxes were reduced, in many of those years revenues increased?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I have not examined the figures for the tax receipts during those years. However, I have no doubt that the revenues did increase. On the other hand, tax revenues decreased sharply after the crash in 1929. They did so without any reduction of tax rates at all. They decreased because the policies which were being followed were destroying the ability of the people to earn money; they were destroying the ability of the farmers to earn a living. They were the policies which brought about the agricultural crash; they were the policies which brought about the crash in industry, as well.

THE DEPRESSION DEBT

Mr. President, I have been endeavoring to show the figures with respect to the cost of the depression in terms of debt, as compared with the cost of the war. In terms of debt, the cost of the depression may be obtained by comparing the debt on the 30th of June 1941, before we actually entered the war, although after we were incurring war expenditures, with the amount of the debt at the end of the fiscal year 1933, which was the amount inherited at the beginning of the Democratic administration under President Roosevelt. On the 30th of June 1941 the debt was $48,961,443,536. On the 30th of June 1933 the debt was $22,538,672,560. By subtracting the debt as of 1933 from the debt as of 1941, we find that the cost of the depression, in terms of national debt, was the difference, or $26,422,770,976.

Mr. President, on the 30th of June last, after billions of dollars had been paid on the debt by the administration of President Truman, the national debt amounted to $269,422,099,173. If we subtract the debt as of June 30, 1941, namely, $48,961,000,000, from the $269,422,000,000, we find that the cost of the war in terms of debt amounts approximately to $221,000,000,000. That is the cost of the war in terms of debt. That is the debt which carries the interest payment of $5,000,000,000 every year. World War II in terms of debt cost 10 times World War I. Surely we cannot take any more chances.

During this week, while the subcommittee is making up its mind about how to wield the ax in the dark and how many billions of dollars it will cut from the President's budget, in order that it may make up its mind how many billions of dollars it will cut off the tax revenues, no doubt in many speeches which will be made at Lincoln Day banquets the budget which President Truman recently sent to Congress will be compared with some budget of 1938 or 1939, before the war. O Mr. President, our friends who make such a comparison are forgetting the fact that in 1939 there was no $5,000,000,000 in interest payment on the debt, there was no $7,000,000,000 payment for veterans, there was no $2,750,000,000 payment for tax refunds under a tax bill which was lobbied through the Senate and the House of Representatives a year ago by big business, just as big business now is short-sightedly trying to lobby through the Senate and the House of Representatives a tax-reduction program.

A few days ago I made a check upon the famous pay-as-you-go tax bill, which requires the taxpayers to file an estimated return for each year on the 15th of March, and to file a final return later in the year or at the beginning of the next year, a system under which the taxpayer is entitled to a refund, if he has overpaid. I found a condition which struck me as being very amazing. For the last year for which the accounts have been compiled—as I recall it was 1944—some 42,000,000 taxpaying returns were filed with the Treasury Department. I wonder if Senators know how many refunds are being granted. The number is in excess of 30,000,000. Under this efficient tax system, this pay-as-you-go system, we have established an income-tax department which has to take the money from estimated returns and for refunds when the final return is filed.

There is talk about extra employees. There is talk about employees who should be dropped from the pay roll. Mr. President, how many thousand clerks are on the pay roll of the Internal Revenue Bureau to make the refunds brought about under a bill which was lobbied through the Congress by the big-business interests of the country? They said, "We want a sound tax system, a pay-as-you-go system." That was a wonderful slogan. And now they say, "Why balance the budget." They say, "Let us reduce taxes, let us cut expenditures."

Mr. President, when we begin to cut expenditures we are not going to begin with expenditures for the veterans, which are in excess of $7,000,000,000. We are not going to take it out of the interest on the public debt, which is $5,000,000,000. That makes $12,000,000,000. We are not going to take it out of the refunds which have been authorized by law, which amount to another $3,000,000,000, or nearly that. That makes $15,000,000,000. Surely we are not going to take it out of national defense, which requires another $11,000,000,000. Those are new and inescapable charges. Who said there were any such charges as that in the Budget of 1939, or 1938, or 1937, or of any previous year?

ECONOMIC PEACE ESSENTIAL TO MILITARY PEACE

O Mr. President, I see that the distinguished President pro tempore of the Senate is now presiding over this body. I am happy he is, because I am glad to make comment upon the fact that he has shown a patriotic disposition to work for the peace of the world, and that he recognizes, and has so stated on many platforms, that military peace and economic peace are parts of the same objective, and that we cannot hope to win permanent peace for the nations of the world, we cannot hope to win permanent peace for ourselves, unless we win economic peace.

Mr. President, until we attain a realization of the fact that it is better to spend a little money to preserve economic peace than to spend a lot of money to wage a war, we will be headed down the road which is being marked out by some of the distinguished leaders in the House of Representatives who are talking about budget reduction to the extent of $5,000,000,000 and tax reduction to the tune of three or four billion dollars.

Mr. President, let us follow a policy which will declare that while the people are earning money, while they are capable of paying the tax, we shall levy the tax, and if there is anything left over after we have eliminated waste and extravagance, and after we have paid the appropriations which are necessary to maintain the economy of the country, we shall apply it on the debt, and not on tax reduction.

We are dealing with the preservation of the system of private property, and we cannot preserve that system by repeating now the errors which were made after World War I, when the pattern was laid down by a Republican administration, for the Republican policy which some of the leaders, thank God not all of them, are now trying to force upon the country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a table I have prepared on the national debt, as well as parts of the tables dealing with the period since 1919 to date, appearing in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1946, be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the table and portions of tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

National debt for two world wars and depression

ANSWER BY SENATOR STEWART TO ATTACK BY MARQUIS CHILDS ON SENATOR McKELLAR

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I take notice at this time of the column by Mr. Marquis Childs which appeared in the Washington Post on February 8, and in other newspapers throughout the Nation, I presume, on or about the same date. This column is well known. It is entitled "Washington Calling." Under that headline the particular column to which I am now adverting is entitled "Dishonorable Performance," and speaks in very ugly terms of my distinguished and honorable colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. President, this is one of the most abusive and one of the ugliest expressions of hate and malice I have ever seen. It is a complete picture of a perfect conniption.

Mr. Childs begins his article by stating:

> In the long history of the United States Senate there have been scoundrels and fools as well as great men. There have been vainglorious egotists and chattering pygmies as well as statesmen and heroes.
> But it is just possible that, in the long history of the Senate, there has never been any performance so dishonorable as that of Senator KENNETH MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, in the case of David Lilienthal. That is the unenviable record he will carry to his grave. It is another black mark in the book of American political history.

So the article continues.

Mr. President, I take notice of this because my colleague, Senator McKELLAR, is not a dishonorable man, and the methods to which he is resorting in exposing to the people of America the public career of a man who is almost tainted with communism do not constitute a dishonorable performance.

Senator McKELLAR has a long and honorable career of service in the Senate, and indeed in the other House of the National Legislature. This is the first time in my acquaintance with Senator McKELLAR that any man has ever called him dishonorable or dishonest; and for me to say what I believe—indeed what I feel sure I know—in reply to Mr. Childs, and call him what I think he is, would be for me simply to descend to the low level which he occupies and from which he is writing at this moment.

I am sorry that this man, whose column is known throughout the country, thus lost his reason and so completely lost control of himself as to cause his hitherto, to some degree at least, well-reasoned articles to decline in the estimation of those who read them.

Certainly this article in Saturday's Post is not an appeal to reason. It merely registers hate and malice, and draws a complete picture of a man who has lost control of himself.

Senator McKELLAR has served the people of Tennessee and of the Nation for more than 30 years in the National Houses of Congress; and even before that time, before he came here, he had already established in his own State of Tennessee a name of integrity and honor. No man can place his finger upon any crooked card that Senator McKELLAR ever turned, and no man of honor and integrity himself will undertake to do so. No public servant has a cleaner and more honorable record.

I am sorry this happened. I am sorry that Mr. Childs abuses the privilege of freedom of speech that is accorded him by the laws of this land, and stoops to a campaign of abuse which only exhibits uncontrolled hatred and malice and is 100 percent untrue.

In the hearings which are proceeding before the Committee on Atomic Energy, a great many witnesses have been examined, and a great deal of evidence of different kinds has been produced; and the fact that 2 years ago there developed within the Tennessee Valley Authority a movement by a group of men who were employed by that Authority, which had for its purpose the development of a communistic group or organization, was proved at these hearings. It was shown that quite a number of men in the employ of the Authority joined this movement and became, as I understand, for a time at least, acknowledged Communists.

This was brought out by my colleague at these hearings, and it was shown that this occurred when Mr. David Lilienthal was Chairman, or at least when he was a member of the Tennessee Valley Authority; and for a few years, indeed, he was Chairman of that Authority.

I think this fact, having been developed, regardless of what might be the present situation there—and God knows I hope there are no Communists in the Authority now, or employed by the Authority in any capacity—this fact having been brought out, and the further fact that Senator McKELLAR, my colleague, had a great deal to do with it, is a thing for which he should be commended instead of abused. I think Senator McKELLAR has made a contribution to the people of this country. I think he has made a contribution to our Government, by exposing the communistic practices that existed in the Authority at the time when Mr. Lilienthal was a member of it.

Someone said Mr. Lilienthal denied he had anything to do with the employment of these men. It is one thing to deny and another to be actually chargeable with responsibility. Mr. Lilienthal denies that he is a Communist, but it appears to me that he has been flirting with communism or mighty near the fringe of communism; and for Senator McKELLAR to be called a dishonest man because he has brought to the attention of the Nation these conditions is, to say the least of it, very unfortunate.

Mr. President, this article goes on to say:

> Tennessee's delegation in Congress today is well above the average if one excludes McKELLAR. It is largely composed of men of capacity and integrity. But the stain of McKELLAR and, behind him, "Boss" Crump, of Memphis, spreads a long way.

He proceeds then to abuse Mr. Crump, another man whose character he is not capable of criticizing. Mr. Crump and Senator McKELLAR have lived together in the great city of Memphis, located upon the banks of the Father of Waters, in my State of Tennessee, for more than a half century. Together, they have helped to build this great city—indeed, Mr. Crump's contribution to Memphis cannot be described—and with it they have grown until now they have both reached that place in life which we often refer to as the "western slopes." They have reached that point in life where there lies not in front of them the active years which were there a half century ago, when as young men they met and lived in Memphis. But they can look back over those years and be proud of the honest record they have established, each one of them.

They have been assailed before, though no man has ever questioned the honor and the integrity of either one of them as this man Childs has. But they have been assailed by men who fired larger guns than Mr. Childs. So I feel they will survive this assault as they have the others.

I want to commend my colleague for turning the light of publicity upon the activities of these men in the Tennessee Valley Authority who have flirted with communism. When columnists attack men in public life and say mean and nasty and ugly things about them, there is little we can do except to resent it. So long as we allow freedom of speech and so long as we have men who will abuse that freedom, public men—who, God knows, live hard enough lives anyway in the effort to serve their people honestly—will have to continue to endure these attacks; but I suppose that even dogs may bark at kings.

APPOINTMENT OF POSTMASTERS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, it is with reluctance and with a genuine feeling of sorrow that I feel compelled, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Civil Service, to bring to the attention of my colleagues a most deplorable situation in the Post Office Department of the Government.

So that Senators may know how many postmasters there are, I wish to say that the estimated number for the next year is 2,234 of the first class, 5,712 of the second class, and 14,194 of the third class; all of whom, under the present law, are appointed for life. In addition to that, there are 19,638 of the fourth class.

For the information of Senators I desire to describe how postmasters in the first-, second-, and third-class post offices are appointed.

Appointments to positions of Presidential postmaster of the first, second, and third classes are governed by the Civil Service Act, the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944, and specifically by the act of June 25, 1938, which brought Presidential postmaster positions under the competitive system.

The act of June 25, 1938, as amended in 1940 and again in 1941, provides for appointment of first-, second-, and third-class postmasters in the civil service, without term, by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The law provided that appointments should be made in one of the following ways:

First. By nominating the incumbent postmaster at the time the law was passed, provided that the Civil Service Commission certified that he met the requirements for eligibility;

Second. By promotion from within the postal service after the Civil Service Commission has certified that the person proposed for promotion meets minimum qualifications;

Third. From among the highest three eligibles certified by the Civil Service Commission after a competitive examination held by that Commission; or Fourth. By appointment of a Civil Service Retirement Act annuitant as provided for in the act of January 24, 1942.

In the case of first-class postmasters, the civil-service examination consists primarily of a personal investigation designed to evaluate the business experience, qualifications, and suitability of all applicants.

In the case of second-class postmasters, the examination consists of a written test and a personal investigation.

In the case of third-class postmasters, the examination consists of a written test and an appropriate investigation by correspondence.

After the Civil Service Commission conducts an examination, it sends a list of three eligibles to the Postmaster General.

Under the practice which has been followed since the passage of the act of 1938, the Postmaster General then sends the list certified by the Civil Service Commission to the Democratic Representative for the district in which the particular post office is located. The Democratic Representative then indicates to the Postmaster General which one of the persons on the list he prefers. The name of this person is then sent to the President for nomination by him, to be sent by him to the Senate.

If the congressional district in which the post office is located is not represented by a Democratic Representative, the list supplied by the Civil Service Commission is sent to a Democratic Member of the Senate from the State in which the post office is located. If the State in question is not represented by a Democratic Senator, then the list is submitted to the Democratic State chairman or national committeeman for that State.

The procedure which is followed in referring lists of eligibles furnished by the Civil Service Commission to Representatives of the Democratic Party is, of course, one of the principal reasons why very few, if any, Republicans have been appointed to postmaster positions since the passage of the 1938 act.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me for a question?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Has the Senator from North Dakota any evidence that after examinations have been held and the names of three eligibles placed on the list, such examinations have been declared void and new examinations held so as to make it possible to have placed on the eligible list individuals who will suit a Representative or a Senator, as the case may be?

Mr. LANGER. I may say that a Senator from a State which has no Democratic Representatives or Senators stated that as many as four examinations have been called for, after which no Republican appeared on the list.

Definite allegations have been made that this practice not only results in a Democratic monopoly on these jobs but also results in a violation, at least in the spirit, of the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944.

Under this act, if a veteran is at the head of a list certified by the Civil Service Commission, the Postmaster General cannot pass over the veteran in order to reach a nonveteran without first presenting his reasons to the Civil Service Commission. If the Commission overrules the reasons, the Postmaster General, under the law, can still select a nonveteran. It is the intention of the Civil Service Commission, however, to find out how often the Postmasters General holding office since 1932 have done this, and in so doing have violated the clear intention of the Congress of the United States to grant preference to veterans.

A fact of the matter is that the Veterans' Preference Act specifically states that it is preference which should be the determining fact in the appointing of postmasters, who are all appointed for life.

As far as the veteran is concerned, the Civil Service Committee intends to do everything within its power to see that there is complete adherence to both the spirit and the letter of the Veterans' Preference Act when it comes to the appointment of first-, second-, and third-class postmasters.

Under any sound concept of preference for veterans, a man who has fought for his country is entitled to that preference, irrespective of his party affiliation.

The members of the Senate Civil Service Committee intend to do everything they possibly can to see to it that the civil service operates in such a manner as to insure that veterans will be given the preference of first-, second-, and third-class postmasterships which the Nation wants them to have. I believe this applies to Democratic and Republican members alike.

In view of a resolution which I shall offer, and which I believe will be adopted, the Senate Civil Service Committee will hold up the appointments now pending before it and others which may be sent to the Senate by the President until after this investigation is completed. I particularly wish to call that fact to the attention of the majority leader of the Senate.

Certainly if the charges made are true the people of this country would not want to see a man appointed to a postmastership for life through any conspiracy.

So far as the roughly 500 nominations now pending before the Civil Service Committee are concerned, no action will be taken on any one of them until they have been subjected to the closest possible scrutiny in order to determine whether any of the practices referred to in the resolution I shall offer have been indulged in in connection with them.

That the system outlined above, particularly prior to the passage of the Hatch Act, has been a very lucrative source of revenue for the Democratic political machine can easily be demonstrated.

In North Dakota, there is a little town called Marion, of some 500 population. Some time ago a man by the name of Cleo Flugga was appointed postmaster at Marion, La Moure County, N. Dak., which happens to be the county from which my distinguished colleague comes. Mr. Flugga has long been a capable, efficient, postmaster. Then came the so-called coalition outfit to collect funds. Mr. Flugga is a poor man, and he needed his job. So on the 4th day of June 1936, at the very time when this coalition outfit was shouting over the radio for clean, honest government, he issued his check for the sum of $10 to the treasurer of the State Democratic Party in order, as he believed, to hold his job as postmaster. I have that check in my possession.

On July 1, 1936, he gave the State Democratic Party another check for $10. The man to whom he gave it was one of the campaign managers for the Democratic candidate for governor of North Dakota. I have that check in my possession.

On July 17, 1936, he gave another check for $10, this time to the county chairman of the Democratic Party. I have that check in my possession.

On July 31, 1936, he gave another check for $5, payable to the State Democratic organization.

On August 31, 1936, he gave another check for $5, which I hold in my possession, to the Democratic candidate for governor's assistant manager.

On October 1, 1936, he gave another check, which I hold in my possession, to the Democratic candidate's crowd.

In 1937 he continued to give cash and checks to the Democratic Party of La Moure County.

In 1938 the Democratic candidate for Governor was elected Governor of the State. For some time prior to that, he and the other part of that two-headed machine, the former Republican Representative, were shouting over the radio and upon the platforms for clean government, efficient government, honest government, condemning alleged kick-ins and kick-backs, and shouting to the high heavens how honest they were and what a fine thing the Hatch Act was. On January 1, the county chairman of the Democratic Party of La Moure County took a check for $10 from the postmaster at Marion. I hold that check in my possession.

On January 15, 1938, this postmaster in the little town of Marion, who was receiving an insignificant salary, was asked to contribute $10 to the Jackson Day committee. He and his family being hard up, he said he could not then pay $10, as requested, but that he would give a check for $5 and also a check postdated February 15, 1938, for a like amount. I hold both checks in my possession. But, poor as he was, the coalition gang wanted more money; and so, on March 1, 1938, he issued another check payable to the Democratic State committee. I hold that check in my possession.

In April 1938, it seems the Democratic National Committee needed some money; so on April 15, 1938, he issued a check to the Democratic National Committee, and on the back of the check, which was endorsed by the National Democratic Committee, there appear the following words:

Paid to the Bank of Manhattan Trust Co. for credit to the account of the Democratic National Committee.

On May 2, 1938, this poor man issued another check to the Democratic political manager. On June 2, 1938, he issued another check to the same man.

On July 1, 1938, he issued another check made payable to the State Democratic committee.

On August 1, 1938, he issued another check to the county Democratic committee, and on September 1, 1938, he gave them another check.

I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that these checks were always dated the 1st of the month. Whenever the 1st of the month arrived, the collector was on hand to collect the money.

On November 3, 1938, this man, confused as to whether he should pay the governor's Democratic Party, the county Democratic Party, or the national Democratic Party, issued his check as follows:

Pay to the order of La Moure County Democratic.

In addition to all these checks, which Senators will note were consistently given on the 1st and the 15th of each month, Mr. Flugga made other payments in cash. When he stopped paying cash, and when he stopped giving checks, there was taken from him his noncompetitive examination privilege, that being given as a reason for not holding him in office as postmaster at Marion, N. Dak. In North Dakota the politicians apparently shook down this postmaster at Marion for 5 percent of his salary. When they tried to remove him I immediately made a speech on the floor of the Senate. I kept him in his job in 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944, 1945, and 1946. He is still postmaster at Marion, and I intend to keep him there until the Postmaster General can show definitely that he is not qualified to hold that position.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERGUSON in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is showing the so-called abuses which occasionally occur in connection with postmasterships. Let me say that I had the same experience during the Republican administration of Herbert Hoover. That case involved the postmistress at Oxford, Md. Year after year I made speeches on the floor of the Senate, and the lady held her position until she died.

Mr. LANGER. I will say to the distinguished Senator that that may be true. I was not in the Senate at that time. But I invite the attention of the distinguished Senator to the fact that we passed a Civil Service Act under the administration of the late President Roosevelt. The idea was to take those jobs out of politics, and to obtain the best Republicans or the best Democrats in the various towns to be postmasters. I say that the spirit, if not the letter, of the law has been violated.

The distinguished junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] is now presiding over this body. During the past 14 years, although the Civil Service Act has been in full effect, not a single Republican has been appointed to the office of first-, second-, or third-class postmaster in the State of Michigan.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Has the Senator any knowledge as to whether this particular postmaster has contributed to any of the Republican campaign funds in La Moure County?

Mr. LANGER. I asked him, and he said he had not.

Mr. TYDINGS. How long has the Senator been keeping him in office?

Mr. LANGER. Since 1941, when I first arrived in the Senate.

Mr. TYDINGS. And he has not made any contributions to the Senator's knowledge, or has not told the Senator that he has made any contributions, to Republican campaign funds?

Mr. LANGER. He has not contributed one penny, to my knowledge.

The total postmaster pay roll in our State is $710,527.48. Therefore, if all the postmasters, not including the rural-mail carriers, paid the coalition gang at the same rate, it collected more than $35,000 a year. If the same rate of collection took place all over the Nation, the graft amounted to 5 percent of $88,220,000.

In view of the record, is it not proper that before this representative body of the people confirms another postmaster nomination and especially before it throws out of office any persons now holding positions as postmasters, an investigation be held by the Committee on Civil Service to ascertain how general is the practice of soliciting money from postmasters on the part of the Democratic National Committee and the State and county committees?

Other postmasters and rural-mail carriers in North Dakota have told persons in confidence that they have contributed to Democratic organizations. The conduct of the Democratic National Committee and State and county committees to which I have referred is all the more reprehensible in the State of North Dakota where, as I say, Democratic politicians and pseudo Republicans joined together and today are masquerading as honest and decent men. The record shows, however, that at the very time the former Governor of the State said in his inaugural address that he condemned contributions and would investigate assessments, he knew that he was holding office because his organization was the recipient of money from postmasters such as Cleo Flugga, of Marion.

From information which has come to me the passage of the Hatch Act has done very little to remedy this situation. Under the Hatch Act Federal employees are not prohibited from contributing to a political organization. They are prohibited from making such contributions in a Federal building. So, under the Hatch Act we have the Jackson Day dinners, and thousands of letters are addressed to the homes of Democratic postmasters asking them to contribute to the Democratic Party through their Jackson Day dinners. In other words, it is a plain, deliberate circumvention of the intent and purpose of the Hatch Act. This explains another reason for the few Republican postmasters appointed in the past 16 years, because each postmaster appointment opened up a fertile field for additional contributions to the political machine.

Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that the 2,234 postmasters now holding first-class postmasterships will receive total salaries for next year of $10,334,000. The 5,712 who hold second-class postmaster appointments will receive total salaries of $20,768,600. The 14,194 postmasters who hold third-class postmaster appointments will receive salaries totaling $33,845,100. The 19,638 holding fourth-class postmaster appointments will receive a total of $19,492,380.

The majority members of the Senate Civil Service Committee are determined to wipe out this sort of thing—we hope forever—in the United States. I therefore submit the following resolution:

Whereas concrete evidence has been presented to the Senate Civil Service Committee that during the years 1933 to 1947, inclusive, very few if any Republicans have been appointed to the positions of first-, second-, or third-class postmasterships;

Whereas evidence is also presented which warrants a full and complete investigation as to whether the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944 has been violated with the result that very few veterans have been appointed to the office of first-, second-, or third-class postmaster and whereas indisputable evidence has been presented that postmasters on threat of losing their positions have been compelled to pay systematic tribute to a group of politicians and whereas approximately 500 appointments to post offices have been made within the last 6 weeks are now pending and whereas within the next few months several hundred more vacancies will likely occur either by resignation, retirement, or death: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate Civil Service Committee, which has the jurisdiction over all civil-service matters in connection with the post office, or any duly authorized subcommittee, is authorized and directed to make a complete investigation as to why few if any Republicans have been appointed to the offices of first-, second-, or third-class postmasters for the last 14 years, how many Republicans have been removed and whether any postmasters on threat of losing their positions have been compelled to pay tribute financially or otherwise to anyone or to a group of politicians. Also whether there has been an attempt to compel men and women occupying the position of postmaster to violate the Hatch Act and to investigate any and all collateral matters which the testimony may develop.

For the purposes of this resolution, the committee or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production and impounding of books, papers, and documents, to administer oaths, and to take such testimony as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, which shall not exceed $———— in addition to the cost of stenographic services to report such hearings, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

I send the resolution to the desk and ask that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

The resolution (S. Res. 81) submitted by Mr. LANGER was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. WHITE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERGUSON in the chair). If there be no reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the calendar.

FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Lawrence Clayton to be a member of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, may I ask if this Mr. Clayton is related to William L. Clayton, of the Department of State?

Mr. WHITE. So far as I know, he is not. I have no real knowledge as to that. I have heard from the two Massachusetts Senators that the nomination is acceptable to them.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that Mr. Clayton has lately been engaged in business in the State of Massachusetts. I happen to know him personally. For several years during the war he was associated with one of the finance agencies of the Government. I do not think there is any relationship between the two persons mentioned.

Mr. LANGER. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Herbert E. Arnold to be collector of internal revenue for the second district of Texas.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask that the nomination be passed over. The junior Senator from Texas [Mr. O'DANIEL] would like to have it go over temporarily.

Mr. WHITE. Two or three Senators have asked that it go over, and I think the Senator from Texas was one of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be passed over.

COMPTROLLER OF CUSTOMS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of S. Scott Beck, Jr., to be Comptroller of Customs, with headquarters at Baltimore, Md.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

That concludes the calendar.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask that the President be immediately notified of the action of the Senate with respect to these nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT OF NOMINATIONS PREVIOUSLY CONFIRMED

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I understand that earlier in the day several hundred nominations reported by the Committee on Armed Services were confirmed by the Senate, but that no action was taken toward notifying the President of the action of the Senate. I therefore ask that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nominations reported from the Committee on Armed Services earlier today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be immediately notified.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, if there is no further business to come before the Senate at this time, I move that the Senate adjourn until tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, February 11, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 10, 1947:

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE

Pasquale J. Federico, of Ohio.
Eugene W. Geniesse, of Michigan.
Samuel Wolffe, of Pennsylvania.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate February 10, 1947:

FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

IN THE ARMY

APPOINTMENTS IN THE REGULAR ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES

The nominations of Milton Fischer and 1,863 other officers for appointment in the Regular Army of the United States, which were received by the Senate on January 27, 1947, and which were referred to the Committee on Armed Services on that day, were confirmed by the Senate today.

(NOTE.—A complete list of the nominations referred to above, may be found in the Senate proceedings of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 27, 1947, under the caption "Nominations," beginning with the name of Milton Fischer appearing on p. 619 and ending with the name of Lynn R. Cheezum appearing on p. 626.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. John R. Caton, St. Paul's Church, Vermillion, S. Dak., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Creator of all things and ruler of the destinies of men and of nations, we give Thee hearty thanks in that Thou hast added to our lives another day wherein we may do unto Thee true and laudable service. So rule over, we beseech Thee, our hearts and minds and wills that all our consultations and deliberations may have Thy guidance, and that we, by Thy help, may serve Thee and the people of these United States of America and the peoples of the world with righteousness and truth. Grant that all things may be so ordered and settled by our endeavors, upon the surest and best foundations, that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety may be established among Thy people for all generations. These and all other necessities for us and for all men we humbly beg in the name and mediation of Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, February 6, 1947, was read and approved.

THOMAS A. EDISON

Mr. SUNDSTROM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUNDSTROM. Mr. Speaker, just for a moment I want you to join me in projecting our thoughts into the next century. The year is 2047 and the month is February. Our Nation has grown and prospered and changed. But in some respects it is the same.

Our first national hero is still George Washington. Time has left undiminished his cherished position within the hearts of the American people. And the memory of our second great son of February, Abraham Lincoln, is still as fresh and as revered as it is in this year of 1947.

Yes, I think we can predict with emphatic certainty that there will be no dwindling of the fame of these two great sons of February. By their deeds—Washington as the molder of our Nation and Lincoln as its preserver—these men infused their memories with immortality.

On the other hand, it is highly improbable that time will further enhance the statures of Washington and Lincoln because their niche in the American scene already has been evaluated and cast in immutable molds.

There is, however, a third son of February for whom time's passage undoubtedly will bring increasing recognition and appreciation. His achievements were such that with each passing year new benefits, new conveniences and services, and new potentials of accomplishment flow from the magic of the things he started. It is of this man that I want to speak to you today.

One hundred years ago this third son of February was born. That he belongs in the illustrious company of Washington and Lincoln there can be no question. He was the essential partner of the two great statesmen who preceded him. He was the man who took the Nation that Washington formed, and Lincoln had preserved, and made it function and flower.

February's third son is Thomas A. Edison. Born February 11, 1847. Died October 18, 1931. Inventor of the electric light, the phonograph, the motion picture, and hundreds of other useful products. Holder of 1,097 patents from the United States Government. An exponent of democracy. A disciple of productive creativeness.

It was Edison who demonstrated how high a man could rise in a free economy. In many countries of his day Edison would have been a maker of wooden shingles because that was his father's trade, and in such countries a son could not rise above his father. And he showed how far a man could go under exceptional handicaps. As a boy young Tom was not strong, and because of his physical condition he was kept out of school beyond the usual age. As a matter of fact, his formal schooling totaled only 3 months.

Yet Tom Edison, the same Tom who was considered "addled" by one teacher because his young imagination was beginning to sprout with genius, made inventions and scientific discoveries which even the most conservative statisticians estimate gave birth to new industries with a capital evaluation of $20,000,000,000 and employing more than 4,000,000 men and women.

But the real measure of Edison's stature cannot be stated in terms of dollars and cents. Hundreds of men accumulated more money than did he. Edison considered money only as a means of carrying on his work. No; you must judge him in the increased standards of living, the comforts, the conveniences, and the millions of jobs that grew out of his inventions and discoveries.

Supposing Edison had been satisfied to do nothing more than invent the first practical incandescent electric lamp. Certainly that one thing alone would have been more than ample to guarantee for him not only renown as an inventor, but wealth as well. Fortunately for the world, Edison was not so easily satisfied. He did not stop with the lamp. To make it useful, he devised an entire generating and distributing system for power and light, including dynamos, generators, insulators, conduits, meters, sockets, fuses, and a hundred other allied items. In all, Edison produced three-hundred-and-sixty-odd inventions necessary to the generation and distribution of electric power.

Let us consider for a moment exactly how Edison's launching of the power and light industry fits in with the American pattern of accomplishment. His successful lamp was perfected on October 21, 1879. Remember the date. It is important because it helps to provide a little-known insight into the circumstances leading up to the invention. Almost a full year earlier, on October 25, 1878, to be exact, the Edison Electric Light Co. was organized. But this company had no products and no services to sell. Its only assets consisted of $300,000 put up by 13 men, among them Edison, and of enough faith in his ability to risk what for the times was a large fortune to finance his experiments. Until a few weeks before this company was formed. Edison had given no thought to trying to invent the electric light. In fact, there were at least six other scientists and inventors who already were working on the problem of lighting by electrical incandescence, each of whom could have correctly claimed a greater knowledge of the subject than Edison.

You may well ask: What if he had failed? Well, what if Washington had failed, or Lincoln? But this third son of February did not fail, and in fulfilling the confidence of his associates he wrote a significant chapter in the annals of American business. Their investment of $300,000 may appear inconsequential in these days; actually, it was one of America's first investments in initiative and enterprise. And it paid off.

Edison's career as an inventor neither began nor ended with the lamp. By the time he got around to working on the lamp he already had to his credit a score or more of important inventions which, had he been interested only in profits, would have been thrice the number necessary to make him independently wealthy. In 1877 he had invented the phonograph, and earlier he had completed a dozen or more improvements in telegraphy, including systems for sending multiple messages over the same set of wires and for receiving and sending messages automatically, and he also had invented the electric pen, forerunner of today's mimeograph machine.

Edison's phonograph was one of the world's most original inventions. Prior to Edison's experiments in the summer of 1877, no one had given serious thought to the possibility of recording sound for future release at will. The phonograph, incidentally, was an oddity among inventions because instead of being the result of months and even years of arduous experimentation by one or more persons exploring scientific facts and theories, the phonograph literally popped out of the hat. Edison was experimenting with an automatic telegraph machine when he noticed that a revolving turntable fitted with a perforated paper disc reproduced a musical hum instead of dots and dashes when the turntable operated at high speed. This led him to investigate the possibility of recording the human voice, which he did successfully on August 15, 1877. That first record was a recitation by Edison of "Mary had a little lamb."

We all know the part played by the phonograph today in the entertainment field, as well as in the teaching of language and enunciation, particularly among handicapped children. Edison foresaw the educational potentialities of his invention. As early as 1890 he wrote an article correctly forecasting the educational purposes to which the phonograph would be put.

While on the subject of the phonograph, it is interesting to note that the coin-in-the-slot machine—or jukebox as we now call it—is no modern invention created for the express amusement of bobbysoxers. Edison made coin-in-the-slot phonographs as far back as 1890. The phonograph in those days was such a novelty that phonograph parlors opened up throughout the country where, for the investment of a nickel, one could listen to the latest recordings. These phonograph parlors were forerunners of the nickelodeons which served to introduce the motion picture to the world. Nickelodeon! It is difficult to mention a development in recent years in which Edison did not play a part. Edison also invented the motion-picture camera. The great industry which sprang from this Edison creation today employs more than 300,000 persons and operates some ten thousand theaters in the United States.

It was the phonograph which gave Edison the idea of making motion pictures. He wanted to do for the eye what his phonograph had done for the ear. Others before Edison had experimented with action photography, but none had produced a method whereby the pictures, once taken, could be viewed in motion. Such men as Edward Muybridge had tried to use a series of cameras arranged to take successive shots of an animal or man in motion. Edison, however, realized the inadequacy of such an approach and constructed a camera which would take successive pictures through the same lens on strips of film fed through the camera.

Knowing Edison's versatility, and the fact that his idea for motion pictures had its genesis in the phonograph, it seems appropriate—although nonetheless astonishing—that when Edison first demonstrated his motion-picture machine in 1897 that the picture was a "talkie." He had synchronized his motion-picture apparatus with a phonograph. And, true to his formula of not leaving a job half done, he pioneered in the development of the motion-picture industry.

The first studio was on the grounds of his laboratory at West Orange, N. J., and the first picture to tell a story was the Edison-produced Great Train Robbery. Prior to the Great Train Robbery, motion pictures had been little more than a presentation of vaudeville acts or of comedy interludes and had not dipped into the greater field of story telling.

Thus far I have mentioned Edison's creation of the power-and-light industry, his invention of the phonograph, the motion picture, and a few more of his inventions. But they are only part of the Edison story. He invented the fluoroscope and the first fluorescent electric lamp; he invented and built the first electric railroad in America; he discovered an electrical phenomenon, known as the Edison effect, which led others to the development of radio, radar, television, and other countless miracles of electronics. He invented and patented a system of wireless telegraphy 6 years before Marconi. He invented the carbon transmitter used in the telephone, and for many years Edison's name as well as Bell's appeared on telephone instruments. He made rubber from goldenrod. He invented and developed the business-dictation machine, storage batteries, and a hundred other useful devices.

Perhaps his work is best summed up in the words of Mr. Charles F. Kettering, director of research for the General Motors Corp.:

Every citizen—

He said—

is as much a beneficiary of Mr. Edison as if he had been mentioned in his will. The comparatively small sum of money Edison may have received for his inventions is microscopic in comparison with the public's benefit—yours and mine.

One might suspect that a man who won more than a thousand patents, who unearthed numerous scientific discoveries of world-changing importance, and who personally launched more than a hundred businesses, must have been a cold, humorless individual with no time for fun. But not so Edison. To the contrary, he was warmly human and possessed of a keen sense of humor.

Old associates of Edison say he liked a good joke. Edison employees often avoided the consequence of mistakes or errors by telling Edison some new story or joke.

He had no vanity, no pomposity. Once a delegation from a foreign government called at Edison's laboratory to award him a medal in recognition of his contributions to mankind. Dressed in top hats and formal attire, they were astounded when Edison made his appearance in old work trousers and an undershirt. He had been too busy working to find time to dress for the occasion.

When Edison died at the age of 84, like so many men he was not through working. He obtained his last patent that same year, and he was in the midst of his experiments to obtain rubber from goldenrod. But he was not left without fitting memorials to his memory. These you can find in every electric light, every phonograph, every motion picture, and every electric train in the world.

Herbert Hoover, then President of the United States, described his loss better than I can. Referring to a suggestion that the electric current of generating plants he turned off in honor of Edison at the time of his funeral, the President said:

On inquiry I find that this would constitute a great peril to life throughout the country because of the many services dependent upon electrical power in the protection from fire, the operation of water supply, sanitation, elevators, operations in hospitals, and the vast number of activities which, if halted for an instant, would result in death somewhere in the country. This demonstration of dependence of the country upon electrical current for the life and health is in itself a monument to Mr. Edison's genius.

THOMAS A. EDISON

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include therein an address I delivered on Thomas A. Edison 7 years ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SUNDSTROM] has just said, tomorrow will be the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Thomas A. Edison, the greatest genius this Nation has yet produced; a man who did more for humanity than any other individual, perhaps, in all history.

This will be known as the century of Edison.

Shakespeare says:

Let fame, that all hunt after in their lives,
Live register'd upon our brazen tombs,
And then grace us in the disgrace of death;
When, spite of cormorant devouring Time,
Th' endeavour of this present breath may buy
That honour which shall bate his scythe's keen edge,
And make us heirs of all eternity.

Thomas A. Edison, one of the most unassuming of men, by his untiring efforts bated the subtle edge of time's keen scythe and made himself heir of all eternity.

An address I delivered a few years ago on Thomas A. Edison has been published in a volume that is being used in public-speaking courses in some of the leading colleges and universities of the country; and for that reason, instead of extending my own remarks, I am merely going to insert the speech I delivered at that time. It reads as follows:

THOMAS ALVA EDISON

(Speech of Hon. JOHN E. RANKIN, of Mississippi, in the House of Representatives, Monday, February 12, 1940)

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay my humble tribute to the memory of one of America's most illustrious sons.

Yesterday was the ninety-third anniversary of the birth of Thomas Alva Edison, our country's greatest contribution to the world's list of scientific men.

He was the foremost inventive genius of the age and one of the leading benefactors of mankind. He was the greatest liberator the world has ever known. By the force of his matchless genius, aided by his tireless energy, he struck the shackles of drudgery from untold millions of human beings and lifted the world into the light of a new civilization, the like of which humanity had scarcely dreamed.

He stands in history among the leaders of the men of genius of all time—Homer, Gilileo, Michelangelo, Rembrandt, Mozart, Cervantes, Shakespeare, Columbus, Jefferson, Newton, and Marconi. Towering amid that great galaxy rises the immortal figure of Edison, in glorified silhouette against the horizon of the ages, sending a glow of radiance down the centuries to come, to stir the hopes and fire the imaginations of toilers of the future who struggle for the betterment of mankind.

It is unnecessary to attempt to magnify his virtues, to minimize his vices, or to clothe him with qualities he did not have. All that is necessary to commend him to the minds and hearts of peoples of all climes is the simple story of this earnest, patient man, toiling through the silent hours of the night to make the world a better place in which to live.

He was the greatest public servant of his day; yet he held no political office, he founded no political party, he advanced no new political creeds. Therefore no array of illustrious speakers volunteer to sing his praise or use his name as a sounding board to further selfish ends.

He was one of the mightiest conquerors this world has ever seen; yet he waged no wars of human destruction, he fought no bloody battles, he stirred no fires of human hate nor pandered to the baser passions of the race. But he conquered the elements, as it were, and gave to humanity the greatest ascendancy over the forces of nature the world has ever known. He brought the dawn of a new civilization—the electric age.

He never intentionally hurt a human being. Therefore no memorial has been erected to him in his country's Capital, no monument dedicated to his name, no blazing epitaph upon these historic walls proclaim his services to the world.

I sometimes wonder if we really appreciate the services of men of genius. They scale the heights and blaze the way to those sublime achievements that mark the milestones in the progress of the race, while men of talent dig in, solidify, and hold the gains and enjoy the progress that genius makes.

Have you ever thought what would happen if we should lose all that men and women of genius have accomplished for the world? What this land would be like? It would be a different world—cold, pulseless, monotonous, and silent. Our transportation system would come to a standstill, the telephone and telegraph wires would become useless obstructions, the lights would go out, the radio would be silenced, and all the machinery of industry, as well as that of commerce would cease to move. As has been well and wisely said, if you take from the world all that genius has given, "all the niches would be empty, all the walls would become naked, meaning and connection would fall from words of poetry and fiction, music would go back to common air, and all the forms of subtle and enchanting art would lose proportion, to become the unmeaning waste and shattered spoil of thoughtless chance."

It would be useless to attempt to enumerate all the things that Edison did for mankind. His greatest contribution was the invention of the electric light—the incandescent lamp. With that one act he did more to change the course of our civilization than has any other man who ever "lived in the tide of time." He not only lighted our halls, our homes, our streets, and our highways, but he gave us the spark that fires the gas that makes the motor machine possible.

He ushered in the electric age, and the motor age as well. He made possible the automobile, the X-ray, the airplane, the submarine, the moving picture, and the radio. He gave us a new system of overland transportation. taught us to navigate the air, and enabled us to roam with safety on the bottom of the seas. He eliminated time and space and aided us to see through objects that were formerly supposed to exclude all light.

He made possible mass production through new industrial machinery, and gave us that great multiplicity of electrical appliances that add to the comforts and conveniences of every home and every business establishment. He made necessities luxuries, and luxuries necessities, and enabled us to electrify the farm homes of America and to lift from the shoulders of burdened humanity the great weight of drudgery under which farm men and women have struggled since the beginning of time.

He tapped a source of wealth richer than the diamond mines of Golconda, more valuable than all the oil fields and all the gold and diamond mines of the modern and ancient world—a wealth that is inexhaustible, and one that will last as long as rains fall and rivers flow to the sea.

His monument is in every home that turns an electric switch; his epitaph is written on every heart that beats in gratitude for the services he gave. He needs no pompous memorial to commemorate his life. He needs no monument save the eternal and indestructible substance of his own greatness to commend him to the consideration of all coming ages. His name will live and his fame will reach to the remotest times in which civilized man shall dwell upon the earth.

Someone has said that—

"They are the truly great who, as the centuries slowly pass, are found by each succeeding race near to the heart of human love."

Centuries may come and go, empires may flourish and pass away, republics may rise and fall, but the work of Edison will endure.

When the monuments to lesser men shall have perished with the lapse of time, when this Republic shall have run its course and taken its place among the dead nations of the past, when in the distant lapse of ages yet to come, errant wanderers from different lands shall stand before the crumbling columns of this Capitol and look down across the ruins of the District of Columbia, the name of Thomas A. Edison will remain, unscarred by the wreck of ages and undimmed by the floods of time. [Applause.]

NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON FIRE PREVENTION

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the holocaust of fire which recently swept through the Hotel La Salle in Chicago, the Winecoff Hotel in Atlanta, and within the not distant past devastated many others with an appalling loss of life, has served to focus the attention of the American people on the serious problem of fire prevention. The tragic cost in human lives and suffering, the profligate waste of natural and material resources, with their inevitable dislocation of both family and economic life, challenge our attention as never before.

It is gratifying to note that the President of the United States, cognizant of this grave situation, has called a national conference on fire prevention to be held here in Washington on May 6, 7, and 8, and has appointed Maj. Gen. Philip B. Fleming to act as general chairman.

This conference will be Nation-wide, participated in by officials of States, municipalities, the Federal Government, and representatives of business, professional, civic, and service organizations.

In addition to developing a needed sense of personal responsibility on the part of every citizen to eliminate carelessness, which contributes such a large proportion of our fire destruction, the conference will undoubtedly create a wider recognition by public officials everywhere of the importance of providing more adequate standards relating to building construction, and firm and impartial enforcement of building codes and fire-prevention ordinances.

I express the hope that the President's conference next May will see municipal authorities from every State meeting here in Washington to confer with experienced leaders in the fire-prevention and fire-safety field, and with private and unofficial groups, all dedicated to the solution of this great problem; and that out of their serious deliberations will emerge a practical and workable program which will result in stemming the constantly upward trend of fire deaths and fire waste.

I congratulate the President on calling this conference, an action which I am sure every Member of Congress, regardless of party, will heartily approve. Devastating fires know no partisanship, and adequate remedies brook none.

Irreplaceable homes, factories, churches, and schools, as well as forests, growing crops, and other component parts of our national wealth, but above and beyond these, the thousands of men, women, and little children who each year perish by preventable fire, and the countless others maimed or incapacitated for life, evidence a deplorable disfigurement on our national canvas which, it is fervently hoped, the constructive efforts of this oncoming conference shall obliterate.

SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 25 minutes on Wednesday of next week after the disposition of special orders heretofore granted and the conclusion of the legislative program of the day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

HOLD DOWN THE BUDGET

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, President Truman says that his budget for the fiscal year of 1948 of $37,500,000,000 is so tight that it cannot be reduced, hence there can be no reduction of taxes.

Chairman Roswell Magill, former Chief Attorney for the United States Treasury, former Assistant and Under Secretary of the Treasury, Chairman of the Postwar Tax Policy Committee with five of the ablest tax experts in the Nation, after having made a 2-year study of all the financial phases of the Government came out today with a public statement that the budget can and should be reduced to thirty-one to thirty-two billion dollars which would allow a 20 percent tax reduction for everyone, balance the budget and leave $3,600,000,000 to be paid on the national debt.

They also say that the budget in the following year can be reduced to twenty-five billion.

Mr. Speaker, 2 weeks ago I urged that the Congressional Budgetary Committee fix a ceiling not to exceed $30,000,000,000 for the fiscal year 1948 and at that time suggested that the budget could be cut an extra $5,000,000,000 for 1949, reducing Government expenses to $25,000,000,000. Naturally, I am rather pleased to note that this committee, which for 2 years has made a study, follow very closely the figures I offered from the floor of the House recently.

The gentleman from New York, Congressman TABER, and the other able members of the Congressional Budget Committee have been making a heroic effort to reduce this budget to $30,000,000,000. They deserve the thanks and the support of every Member of this body. The people we represent are back of them in their effort 100 percent. The people are demanding a reduction of excessive taxes, that the budget be balanced, and that a substantial payment be made on the national debt. Obviously, you cannot cut taxes unless you cut governmental expenses. This committee, in setting this budget, had better err on the side of economy than to err on the side of extravagant expenses and bureaucracy.

There has been a world of propaganda put out by the left-wingers and from the administration to influence this committee against cutting the budget to $30,000,000,000. The people, however, are standing firm for every possible reduction of Government expense. The way to make a bold stand that will receive the thanks of the Nation is to hold this congressional budget down to $30,000,000,000.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOEVEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include certain material.

Mr. KEARNEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. BUTLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD with reference to a bill he introduced today.

Mr. ROSS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a Lincoln Day address by Hon. IRVING M. IVES, a Senator from New York.

Mr. GAVIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include two editorials from the Bristol (Pa.) Courier entitled "Tariff Trickery" and "Tariff Legend."

Mr. GRAHAM asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement which he filed with the United States Engineers of Pittsburgh, Pa., on Friday last, protesting against the proposed construction of the Erie and Ohio Canals.

Mr. JUDD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances, and in one to include an editorial, and in the other an article.

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter and a resolution.

DAVID E. LILIENTHAL

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I have no idea what the Senate is going to do with the Lilienthal appointment, but I do know that whoever is entrusted with the atom-bomb secret will hold in his hands the power to destroy the world, and that he should be above suspicion. Mr. Lilienthal is not that man.

I have little knowledge of his alleged and widely believed pro-Russianism, but that TVA was permitted, under his management, to become a hotbed of communism, is an admitted fact. The radical and ultraliberal press are ridiculing Senator MCKELLAR in his effort to stop the appointment, but millions of God-fearing Americans, whose first loyalty is to the flag of the Republic, that flag which floats above the Speaker's head, are praying that he succeed. The rejection of this appointment would fall upon the people like a warm raindrop upon a tired and frightened heart.

Mr. Speaker, may we not here this morning add our prayers that this thing which the Communists of the world so passionately wish be not consummated.

Mr. Speaker, if Mr. Lilienthal was the kind of a man the Chairman of this Atomic Energy Commission ought to be he would ask that his name be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

TENURE OF OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. POTTS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. POTTS. Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday a colleague of mine asked on my behalf that unanimous consent be given to my absence from Washington on official business for the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, of which I am a member. Such absence from Washington prevented my voting on House Joint Resolution 27, proposing a constitutional amendment to limit the Presidential tenure to two terms. I regret that official business elsewhere prevented my being here last Thursday to vote on the resolution because of my very strong feelings that we must be ever watchful to preserve American democracy.

To the vast numbers of American people perpetuation in office is a necessary concomitant of fascism, communism, and totalitarianism. It seems to me that we here in America who are privileged to enjoy democracy should take all means to assure that no one person can seek perpetuation in office from whence there might result a Fascist, Communist, or totalitarian state to supplant democracy in America.

Mr. Speaker, were it possible for me to have been here last Thursday I would certainly have voted "yea" on the measure.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RICH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include therein an editorial from the Lancaster Intelligence Journal of January 7, 1947, entitled "A Communist Cannot Be an American and an American Cannot Be a Communist."

Mr. SPRINGER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include therein an address delivered by Hon. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., of Massachusetts, at the annual Lincoln Day dinner held at the Statler Hotel in the city of Washington on February 6, and also to extend his remarks and include an address delivered on the same occasion by Mabel S. Frazer.

INDIANA AND FEDERAL AID

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the Eighty-fifth General Assembly of the State of Indiana has adopted House Concurrent Resolution 2, which I desire to read:

House Concurrent Resolution 2

Indiana needs no guardian and intends to have none. We Hoosiers—like the people of our sister States—were fooled for quite a spell with the magician's trick that a dollar taxed out of our pockets and sent to Washington, will be bigger when it comes back to us. We have taken a good look at said dollar. We find that it lost weight on its journey to Washington and back. The political brokerage of the bureaucrats has been deducted. We have decided that there is no such thing as "Federal" aid. We know that there is no wealth to tax that is not already within the boundaries of the 48 States.

So we propose henceforward to tax ourselves and take care of ourselves. We are fed up with subsidies, doles, and paternalism. We are no one's stepchild. We have grown up. We serve notice that we will resist Washington, D. C., adopting us.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana (the Senate concurring), That we respectfully petition and urge Indiana's Congressmen and Senators to vote to fetch our county courthouse and city halls back from Pennsylvania Avenue. We want government to come home.

Resolved further, That we call upon the legislatures of our sister States and on good citizens everywhere who believe in the basic principles of Lincoln and Jefferson to join with us, and we with them, to restore the American Republic and our 48 States to the foundations built by our fathers.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I intended to write the Governor of Indiana a letter because he was good enough to send me a resolution passed by the general assembly of that State.

I am just wondering how independent Indiana is going to be, whether or not that State wants the Federal Government to withdraw Federal aid to highways in that State, whether or not they want the Federal Government to cease making appropriations for soil conservation and for other matters that directly affect the people of the great agricultural State of Indiana in which, as in the State of Texas, the black lands are washing away.

The question of soil conservation in my opinion, and money expended wisely on it is one of the greatest if not the greatest and most pressing problems of the present day. I am just wondering when these bills come up to help the State in these particulars just where the delegation from Indiana will stand.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

CONGEALED FLORIDA SUNSHINE

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the Florida delegation has sent to the cloakrooms on each side of the aisle, some congealed sunshine in the form of oranges from Florida. We hope you will like these delicious oranges. They are full of vitamins and will give you vim, vigor, and pep to carry out the promises you made during the last campaign.

We want to say to the Republicans that because you elected so many, you Republicans are going to have to eat less; but after having eaten these oranges we hope you will pass a resolution that you would rather have fewer Republicans and more to eat.

Let me say to the delegation from California: We hope that after you sample these oranges you will make some suggestions to the citrus growers of California as to how to grow a good orange.

SYNTHETIC RUBBER

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States in his message of February 7 on synthetic rubber said, among other things:

The security of the United States and the essential needs of its citizens must never again be jeopardized by inadequate or uncertain rubber supplies.

The Congress should deal with all aspects of this matter during the present session because of its vital effect upon our national security.

I further recommend that the Senate and House of Representatives act expeditiously in establishing appropriate committee arrangements to consider the problems involved in maintaining a synthetic-rubber industry in the United States and to draft such legislation as is found to be necessary to accomplish this objective.

Mr. Speaker, the President has pointed out the danger to America if we depend on foreign supplies for rubber. I am sorry that the President did not go farther and recommend a program that would make us self-sufficient in rubber and at the same time provide a market for agricultural products to the end that we would never be plagued with a problem of surpluses.

Now is the time for the Congress to give attention to future farm prices. Should prices for farm products descend to a disastrous low, it would be too late then. Sufficient revenue cannot be secured to meet the Government's obligations unless we have a high national income. A high farm income is very necessary if we are to have prosperity in this country. A farm depression means a Nation-wide depression.

We have the facilities in this country to become self-sufficient in reference to rubber. This Congress ought to enact the necessary legislation to maintain the alcohol rubber industry. Such an industry will provide a market for 400,000,000 bushels of grain.

I arise to ask the question, Are we going to permit this potential industry to be junked in order to reestablish the rubber cartel of the world?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ANGELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD on two subjects, in one to include an editorial from the Portland Oregonian and in the other a newspaper article from the same paper.

Mr. TALLE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution passed by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa.

Mr. STEFAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD and include a bill requested to be passed by Gen. Omar Bradley, head of the Veterans' Administration and a letter sent to the Speaker of the House asking for the passage of said bill.

Mr. KNUTSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a very thought-inspiring editorial entitled "Just Who Will Benefit From the Income-Tax Cut?"

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that upon Thursday next at the conclusion of the legislative business and other special orders I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

ECONOMY IN GOVERNMENT

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] should not worry too much about what will happen to the Republicans of Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, and the Midwest. If he is correct in his assumption that should Republicans vote to practice a little economy rather than to continue the wasteful spending of the New Deal, Republicans will all be defeated in 1948, that would be all to the good of his party, and you on that side should not worry about that. Let me add it is just as difficult to get the people out of the notion of asking for and receiving with gratitude subsidies as it is to convince a child that taking from it a stick of candy is all for the best, just as easy as it is to pull a sucking calf away from the cow when it does not want to be weaned. It is just as difficult to get the people away from subsidies and benefit payments. I may say to the gentleman from Texas, do not worry overmuch. The folks in Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, and the Midwest will get along all right when they have taken off their shoulders the burden of paying taxes in order to build highways, harbors, dams, and TVA and to support and aid the people of the South. We love you all, but please, just because we have the money and pay the bulk of the tax bill, do not ask for too much.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Subcommittee No. 2 of the Committee on the Judiciary may have permission to sit in hearing during the day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

THE BUFORD DAM

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I regret that unfortunately what I have to say comes so close behind the interchange between the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. Speaker, I have introduced, today, a bill to provide the necessary funds to pay for engineering, planning, and beginning of construction work of a proposed dam on the Chattahoochee River in Georgia, known as the Buford Dam. It is part of the project known as the Appalachicola, Chattahoochee, and Flint Rivers, Ga. and Fla., in accordance with the report of the Chief of Engineers dated May 13, 1946.

The building of the dams provided for in this project has already been approved. The project has the endorsement of the Corps of Army Engineers. The House Rivers and Harbors Committee held a hearing upon this project on May 3, 1946, at which the project was urged by Representatives PACE and COX, of Georgia and ANDREWS of Alabama. At that meeting, Colonel Feringa, of the Army Corps of Engineers, testified at length concerning the project. He designated the Buford Dam on the Chattahoochee River, just north of Atlanta, as being a multiple-purpose dam, which would provide power; also water for the city of Atlanta, for water conservation; also provide water to improve the low-water flow in the whole Chattahoochee River below Atlanta, and to also furnish a considerable measure of flood control.

Concerning the electric power feature of the Buford Dam, Colonel Feringa testified that the plans provide for a hydroelectric power plant having an installed capacity of 28,900 kilowatts, which would mean approximately 253,000,000 kilowatt hours of electricity annually to be added to our present power supply, for which there is a ready demand and which would be promply absorbed in the power market.

At this same hearing on May 3, 1946, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] testified that the Buford Dam will afford considerable benefits from flood control, and that it is estimated that these flood-control benefits will amount to $100,000 annually. It was testified that the power project would be self-liquidating. Colonel Feringa testified that in his opinion the whole project is self-liquidating because the report shows that the entire project, the benefits to the United States are greater than the costs. In the discussion which occurred between Colonel Feringa, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], and members of the House Rivers and Harbors Committee who were considering the project, Colonel Feringa said:

> The flood-control benefits have been figured from an actual study of the flood-control cost, and we know and can assure the committee costs will be exceeded by the benefits in future years. Power benefits are recaptured in dollars and cents which will be turned back to the Treasurer of the United States * * *. Our district engineer states this power will be needed as soon as the project can be constructed.

The facts which were developed at that hearing are based upon a completely unbiased and unprejudiced study of the project, and indicate that it is meritorious. The report shows that the project will benefit the entire area of 73 counties with a population of about 1,624,000 in 1940, which lie wholly and partially within the basin drained by these rivers. Among the cities in Georgia to be benefited by the project, the report points out, are Atlanta, Macon, and Columbus.

The Buford Dam, it is estimated, will produce more electric power than the dam at Junction. In view of the estimated benefits of $100,000 a year from flood control to be realized from the Buford Dam, and further in view of the much needed electrical power to be produced at the Buford Dam, as well as the benefits to the whole Chattahoochee River from that feature of the Buford Dam which will replenish the low-water flow of the entire river, and particularly because of the benefit to the city of Atlanta and that area by reason of the water-conservation feature of the Buford Dam, I urge that funds be immediately provided to proceed with the erection of this dam. Colonel Feringa, who testified at this hearing, is thoroughly familiar with the details of the entire project. He was district engineer at Savannah, Ga., and has personal knowledge of all these facts, and is very conversant with this part of the country. May I point out that each year this project is delayed means an irretrievable loss not only to Atlanta, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, but to the entire country. The soil which is washed away because of lack of flood control, and the electrical energy which is never utilized because the water flows on to the Gulf of Mexico, are assets which could now day by day be added to the wealth of this country, but which because of its delay, are being lost forever.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday next, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

GREATER USE OF POTATO FLOUR IN BREAD IS URGED

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor today to express my appreciation to the Secretary of Agriculture, the Honorable Clinton P. Anderson, and others in the Department of Agriculture for their ready response to the suggestion which I made in a speech January 14, urging the use of potato flour in the making of bread and other bakery products, as a means of solving America's potato surplus problem.

It is my understanding that the Department of Agriculture, at the instance of Secretary Anderson, is at the present time formulating a program to present to the baking industry and consumers groups outlining the desirability of using more culturized potato flour. I am convinced that this program will solve the critical potato surplus problem and save millions of dollars a year of the taxpayers' money now being paid in support of prices by the Government. At the same time, it will give the consumer a better and more tasty bread—the old-fashioned kind that mother used to make—and will increase the sale of baked goods throughout the country.

The day following my original speech on this subject an expert from the Grain Division of the Department of Agriculture called to congratulate me and to tell me the idea of using potato flour in baked goods was sound. Later, I went to the Department of Agriculture for a conference with heads of various divisions and each one agreed that my proposal was worth while and should be undertaken. All indicated their intention of going ahead with the voluntary program designed to help every consumer and every baker in the Nation learn the usefulness of using potato flour in bread and other bakery products.

They emphasize, and of course I agree with them, that the program by the Government ought to be entirely voluntary and not designed to force any baker, consumer or any one else to use any product he does not want to use. They are going to do an educational job and for that job they are to be congratulated.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, since I made my first speech the potato surplus problem has been pointed up in no uncertain terms on the front pages of our newspapers. The Department of Agriculture has had to reinstate its potato surplus buying program to protect growers against disastrous price breaks. Therefore, it can be understood by every American why there is great interest in this subject in every State. My own State of Michigan grows a lot of potatoes but it is not alone in that respect. Maine, Idaho, California, and Pennsylvania all are up front in potato growing. Potatoes are as important to millions of farmers as any other crop.

There are some angles to the use of potato flour that I had not explored when I originally spoke on the subject. One angle that will be of interest to housewives is that if enough potato flour is used to take millions of bushels of low grade potatoes off the market, the average shopper in the average grocery store will be able to buy better potatoes. Potatoes are not graded very carefully in most stores today, mainly because most of the "spuds" are trucked into town and the farmer wants to get rid of all the potatoes he grows whether they are good or bad. If there were a steady market for lower grade potatoes—and they are just as useful as any in making potato flour—the quality of potatoes sold in grocery stores undoubtedly would be much better.

The farmer certainly has a stake in seeing to it that potatoes are used in making flour. Statistics prove that potato consumption in this Nation has dropped from 156 pounds per capita in the 5-year period to 1921, to 125 pounds per capita in 1947. That is a 31-pound decline per person in 23 years or, from another standpoint, a 20 percent loss in market among American housewives for potatoes. Meantime, the acreage devoted to potato growing has declined by about 500,000 acres, but the yield per acre has increased greatly. There are more potatoes each year and fewer potatoes being marketed from the domestic peacetime standpoint. Businessmen know that if such a trend continues, they will lose money in loss of sales to farmers who have depended upon potato money for a livelihood or as a major part of their income.

The addition of potato flour to regular wheat flour, it has been proved conclusively, will add vitamins to the bread that is baked. In addition, the bread will keep much longer than will bread that contains no potato flour. Since bakers throughout the Nation have watched consumption of bread decline regularly they are anxious to find new points to advertise their products. The addition of potato flour to their bread will give them an excellent advertising point and will help the whole baking industry go forward to new sales in this and in coming years.

Only this week experiments in using 3- and 4-percent culturized potato flour in the baking of cakes have been made with excellent results. Because there are so many Members of Congress and their constituents interested in potatoes and potato bread, I want to conclude by announcing that one day soon there will be a potato-peeling contest on Capitol Hill between some nationally known figures from potato-growing States. On that day I shall see to it that my good friend, Jack Schafer, president of the Peter Pan Bakeries of Michigan, shall furnish the House and Senate restaurants with bread made with culturized potato flour so that all Congressmen can see what it is like. Mr. Schafer, who, as I have said before, is no relative of mine, has also promised to furnish cake made with culturized potato flour for dessert.

Mr. Schafer's bakeries in Michigan have produced culturized potato bread for the past few years. He reports that he has increased his sales in the past year alone more than 60 percent over all previous years. He has proved that consumers like culturized potato bread, and he wants to see the people all over the Nation eating and enjoying it to their benefit, to the baking industry's benefit, and to the benefit of potato growers and the taxpayers.

PORTAL-TO-PORTAL LEGISLATION

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I am glad for the indication that the Congress will shortly have an opportunity to pass upon the so-called portal-to-portal question. I want it distinctly understood that I think that such legislation should be enacted at the earliest possible moment. I make this statement in view of the fact that I have seen quoted a remark which I made only in reference to the value or effect of Judge Picard's decision upon possible portal claims against money that has been recovered by the Government under the renegotiation statute. Having initiated that statute by an amendment to the sixth supplemental defense appropriation bill in 1942, I am interested in seeing that the $10,500,000,000 which the Government has recovered shall not be lost through claims under the so-called portal-to-portal decision of last June.

The ruling of Judge Picard, fixing June 10, 1946, the date of the Supreme Court's ruling in the Mount Clemens case, as a deadline behind which claims could not go, if firm and not upset by review, may relieve the urgency somewhat since wartime procurement was before that date. Reprieve for the Government on its renegotiation recoveries, however, does not do the job that needs to be done.

It does not protect either private industry or the Federal Government against claims against contracts made prior to that date and carried on afterward on the basis in which both parties understood the terms to provide. It does not answer the question asked by the court in Anuchick v. Trans-American Freight Lines, Inc. (46 F. Supp. 861), quoted by Judge Picard:

> How can we legally or equitably enforce a penalty for failure to conform with a statutory mandate when the nature of one's duty is not disclosed by the act itself?

Only Congress can remedy that situation.

Legislation is still needed; its merit is emphasized by the logic in the judge's dictum that one should be protected for past acts done in good faith.

Mr. Speaker, at this time, I ask permission to place in the RECORD correspondence which I have had with Col. Maurice Hirsch, Chairman of the Price Adjustment Board, on the effect of the original portal-to-portal decision on the recoveries of the Government under the renegotiation statute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

WAR CONTRACTS PRICE ADJUSTMENT BOARD,
Washington, D. C., January 29, 1947.

Hon. FRANCIS CASE,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CASE: In response to your recent letter, you will be interested to know that on January 21 I had the privilege of appearing before the subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee in connection with the subcommittee's consideration of possible legislation with reference to the so-called portal-to-portal claims.

I did not then have, nor do I now have, a prepared statement, but my testimony before the subcommittee will, I believe, reflect the opinion of the members of the War Contracts Price Adjustment Board with reference to the problems involved in connection with portal-to-portal claims insofar as they may affect the renegotiation activity. I do not have a copy of the testimony, but I am sure that one could be made available to you by the Judiciary Committee.

I do not believe that the finalizing of a renegotiation case would bar the proponent in a portal-to-portal claim as to any right he might have, either on fixed-price or cost-plus-fixed-fee operations, as against the contractor whose renegotiation has been concluded.

In other words, the renegotiation agreement between the Government and the contractor would not affect the portal-to-portal claimant. Nor do I believe that a renegotiation agreement would of itself bar the contractor from recovering from the Government such costs as he might be subjected to in satisfaction of portal-to-portal claims for labor on cost-plus-fixed-fee contracts.

At the same time I feel assured that the very explicit wording of the Renegotiation Act would, in the absence of new legislation, bar the reopening of any closed renegotiation case, and therefore added costs to the contractor for the years as to which renegotiation is closed would not be a basis for the reconsideration of the profit situation of the contractor for the year or years as to which renegotiation of the contractor has been concluded.

However, with reference to fiscal years as to which the renegotiation of a contractor has not been closed, the renegotiating agencies would under the Renegotiation Act be required to allow as costs such costs as they would estimate to be allowable under the Internal Revenue Code, and in the respective years to which for tax purposes such costs would be allocable. If the costs would be deemed under the Internal Revenue Code to accrue after the close of the 1945 year, the War Contracts Price Adjustment Board would have the authority to consider the costs as accruing on the last day of the 1945 year.

Up to the present time the War Contracts Price Adjustment Board has concluded to allow as a cost only those amounts under portal-to-portal claims which are actually crystallized by payment or by final judgment, and only to the extent and in the year in which they are determined to be accrued under the Internal Revenue Code and, of course, only to the degree allocable to the renegotiable business of the contractor for that year.

It is recognized that even this limited recognition given to payments or final judgments on portal-to-portal claims will give an advantage to the contractor who has not completed renegotiation for any year or years as to which for tax purposes any of his portal-to-portal payments will be allocated. Among these contractors are a few who have retarded the closing of their renegotiations because of recalcitrance and purposeful delays in furnishing necessary data. Among those whose renegotiations have not been closed are likewise the comparatively small group of contractors who, from whatever cause, have carried their cases through unilateral determinations into The Tax Court.

In my testimony before the subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee I attempted to point out what appeared to me to be the inequity of allowing the costs, even to the limited extent as I have before explained, only to those contractors who have for whatever reason not concluded their renegotiations. I likewise attempted to emphasize what I personally regard as an even greater inequity if any relief were given solely to those contractors who have made refunds in renegotiation or who may hereafter be required to make such refunds.

As you know, one of the most important objectives, and perhaps the most important objective, of the renegotiation activity was to influence downward the costs, prices, and resultant profit to contractors in their war production.

Almost 74 percent of the cases reviewed by the renegotiation agencies were canceled or cleared as not showing any excessive profits on renegotiable business under the Renegotiation Act. I realize that many of these contractors probably had no excessive profits because of inefficiency, or for other reasons. But a tremendous number of them, in their desire to cooperate to the fullest extent with the Government, purposely held down their costs to the fullest extent achievable and reduced their prices so that no excessive profits would result. Some contractors actually undertook their entire operations in the production of war matériel with the objective of making no profit whatsoever out of their war effort.

It would seem to me that most careful consideration should be given to any legislation which would utilize refunds of excessive profits exclusively for the protection of those who had accumulated profits prior to renegotiation which required the payment of the excessive portion to the Government, and without providing at least comparable protection to those who would more clearly seem to merit it.

If I can give you any additional information or be of added assistance to you in your consideration of the problem, I should be happy for you to call upon me further. I do not forget what your advocacy meant in the establishment of the renegotiation process, and I am happy to know of what I felt assured would be your continuing interest in the administration of the renegotiation law.

Sincerely yours,

MAURICE HIRSCH,
Brigadier General, GSC, Chairman.

WASTE OF POTATOES IS NOT JUSTIFIED

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, I take this minute to call the attention of the House to a piece of mismanagement on the part of Government officials, with regard to the waste of thousands of bushels of potatoes that have been dumped into piles in various places in the country and used for fertilizer. Last week several thousand bushels of potatoes were hauled in a pile at Grand Forks, N. Dak., to be ground up for fertilizer purposes.

Mr. Speaker, it does not make sense that our Government should spend money to support the raising of a potato crop and then destroy the crop in place of using it for food. It is not right that people in this country do not have sufficient food and people in foreign countries are starving for something to eat, while we destroy food at home.

This is a thing that ought to be looked into. We ought to find out why the Government is permitting the waste of food after it has been produced. Surely there ought to be some way to get this food in the hands of people who can use it. To waste food on the one hand when people are in want on the other hand is not right. It just does not make sense. There is absolutely no excuse for it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

LOOSE AND UNFOUNDED CHARGES MADE AGAINST EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS ARE REFUTED

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of answering the unwarranted and unjustifiable attack on Mr. Lilienthal by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX]; nor do I rise for the purpose of defending Mr. Lilienthal against the imputations made against his loyalty, his patriotism, and his devotion to democracy, because he needs no defense at my hands.

WILL LEAVE MATTER TO SENATE

I am satisfied to leave that determination to the Senate, whose duty it is to inquire into his fitness and qualifications, and who have heard the testimony of outstanding citizens of Tennessee and of the country. Those witnesses, who included many of the congressional delegation of Tennessee and nationally known scientists and men of affairs, testified to Mr. Lilienthal's fairness, loyalty, and capability. Mr. Lilienthal himself enunciated his creed of democracy in a brilliant extemporaneous statement which can be compared to the Gettysburg Address of Abraham Lincoln without exaggeration.

Against those responsible, reliable, and well-informed witnesses, there were only a perpetual female hanger-on of hearings to whose statements no credibility can be given; two disgruntled former employees of the Tennessee Valley Authority, who appeared merely to be venting their spleen; and an ex-investigator dismissed only 6 months ago from the Senate Campaign Expenditures Committee under circumstances seriously reflecting against his integrity. It may be, indeed, that my colleague is relying on statements of this unreliable person. I hope not; but I regret that I do not have immediately on hand the statement made by Mr. Lilienthal before the Senate committee, on the one hand, and a column which appeared in the New York Post a week ago concerning this former investigator. The two taken together would give a clear idea of their relative caliber.

RECENT REPORT REFUTED CHARGES

I recollect having read quite recently a report of a committee which spent many months in the investigation of reckless charges that TVA employees were permeated with Communists and Communist sympathizers. The report stated, as I recall it, that under the most searching scrutiny of the 3,400 employees of the Tennessee Valley Authority they were able to find just three whose past connections showed any pinkish leanings.

OTHER DEPARTMENTS GROUNDLESSLY ATTACKED

And now, Mr. Speaker, this gives me an opportunity of calling attention to the fact that other departments of the Government have been similarly attacked without any show of credibility, and particularly that groundless and fantastic charges were made against the State Department. It was said on one hand that the information program of the State Department was filled with propaganda and competed unfairly with commercial news services; on the other hand, loose and sensational charges were made that the State Department was filled with "Communists" and "Russian sympathizers." These charges were made repeatedly on the floor of this House without any real foundation or justification.

NEWSPAPER EDITORS INVESTIGATED INFORMATION PROGRAM

The charges against the information program of the State Department resulted in the appointment of a special committee of eight outstanding newspaper editors who thoroughly investigated the program and the charges; while I was prompted for my part to write to the then Secretary of State, the Honorable James F. Byrnes, in regard to the charges of Communist leanings.

I inserted the letter to the Secretary and his reply to me in the final issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Seventy-ninth Congress; but in view of the many changes in the membership I think it proper that it should be reinserted.

I am also inserting the full text of the report of the committee of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, so that the whole country can see how flimsy are the charges frequently made on this floor, smearing the executive departments and individuals, by reckless reactionary Members.

DOES NOT ALWAYS AGREE WITH DEPARTMENT

In that connection, I do not wish to give the impression that I have at all times agreed with the State Department. I have even charged here on this floor myself that some of the officials of the State Department ignored the instructions, not only of the Secretary of State, but of the President himself; and that in many instances they have been too much influenced by the shrewed conniving British diplomacy; not that I believe they should be influenced by Communists, if there be such. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I deeply resent the slightest suspicion that there should be any influence in any of our departments except that of wholly American interests. The test, as Secretary Byrnes himself once said, is loyalty to the United States of America. I have never charged, and I regret sincerely that the charge was ever made, that the Department of State is filled with incompetents or with Communist sympathizers or fellow travelers.

PRAISED BY EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

I want to point out that Editor and Publisher, the national trade journal of the publishing business, which had been critical of the information program, gave substantial editorial praise to the special committee report in its own news account. Not only to those directly connected with the State Department's information program, but to every American who believes that the best way to insure understanding abroad of America is to tell America's story by America, the strong endorsement of the program is very gratifying.

Ten months ago the American Society of Newspaper Editors instructed its president, Mr. Wilbur Forrest, of the New York Herald Tribune, to appoint a committee of eight editors to investigate world news distribution, with particular attention to the State Department's information activities.

HAD CRITICIZED DEPARTMENT

This was at a time when the press associations were criticizing the State Department. The following newspaper editors, all from newspapers which had criticized the State Department's information program in their editorial columns, were appointed to the committee: N. R. Howard, chairman, editor, Cleveland News; George Cornish, managing editor, New York Herald Tribune; Oveta Culp Hobby, executive editor, Houston Post; Edwin L. James, managing editor, New York Times; Ben M. McKelway, associate editor, Washington Star; Hamilton Owens, editor, Baltimore Sunpapers; Ben Reece, managing editor, St. Louis Post-Dispatch; Gideon Seymour, executive editor, Minneapolis Star-Journal.

The State Department made available to the committee all its radio scripts, all other information materials, all policy directives, and all future plans.

FOUND NO DISTORTIONS

When the committee made its report on December 13, it said, in part, that it found the present uncertainties in international relations justify an effort by the United States Government to make its activities and policies clear to the people of the world.

As to so-called propaganda, the investigating committee took particular pains to search for that in the departmental information program, and reported that, "so far as it could go the committee did not detect distortion, untruth, or hidden purpose in the activity to date."

I hope every Member of this House will read through the text of this important statement by eight outstanding newspaper editors, and especially the individual comments of members of the committee. The text, from which footnotes have been deleted to save space, follows:

TEXT OF REPORT

During the war, three major American news services furnished news to the Office of War Information and the Office of Inter-American Affairs for distribution over the world. Last January, the United Press and the Associated Press terminated this service on the grounds that (1) the war was over, (2) their private functions were jeopardized by governmental connection of any kind, and (3) the fundamental American principle of news distribution was private operation.

BACKGROUND

The Office of War Information, the Office of Inter-American Affairs, and several other State Department war-period operations meantime had been united, under Assistant Secretary of State William Benton into the State Department's Office of International Information and Cultural Affairs which has continued dissemination of news, documents, pictures, statements, and entertainment for which Congress this summer voted an annual appropriation.

Mr. Benton asked the society last April for an exploratory study of the operation, with hopes of enlisting its support. As result of his appearance two resolutions were brought before the executive session of the society membership. Prolonged debate showed there was no majority opinion either for a cordial investigation as proposed by Mr. Benton, or for leaving all news dissemination to private agencies. A resolution finally was voted directing the president of the society to have a committee examine the problem of the world dissemination of news and report back by October 1. Your committee felt it was left to it to channel the more specific survey as a practical matter and points out there would hardly have been time before October 1 to have dealt with every aspect of world dissemination of news.

THE COMMITTEE'S MEETINGS

On June 21 and 22 the Committee met in Washington and interviewed the following: William T. Stone, Director of the Office of International Communication and Cultural Affairs; Charles M. Hulten, Deputy Director; John Howe, special assistant to Mr. Benton; John C. Caldwell, Chief of the China Branch, OIC; Kenneth D. Fry, Chief of International Broadcasting Division, OIC; FitzHugh Granger, Chief of the Latin American Division, OIC; Maurice S. Rice, Chief of the Eastern European Branch, OIC; J. Noel Macy, Chief of International Press and Publications Division, OIC; and John L. Dunning, Assistant Chief of International Press and Publications Division, OIC. The committee enjoyed informal talk also with Under Secretary of State Dean Acheson at a luncheon given by the State Department personnel.

On August 16 and 17 the committee met in New York and interviewed Mr. Benton, who was assisted there by Mr. Hulten, Victor Hunt, policy coordinator, OIC, and Joseph M. Jones, assistant to Mr. Benton; Kent Cooper, general manager of the Associated Press; Lloyd Stratton, assistant general manager; and Alan Gould, executive editor; Earl Johnson, vice president and general news manager of the United Press; and Robert Frye, assistant to the president; and Seymour Berkson, general manager of the International News Service. The chairman had a telephone discussion with Roy Howard, head of the Scripps-Howard operations.

THE GOVERNMENT'S STATEMENT

Mr. Benton gave to the committee a 4,000-word statement of OIC purpose and philosophy resembling his speech to the society last April, but adding two passages to be noted here. The first, an over-all declaration guiding the State Department's news and information dissemination:

"OIC's basic assumption is that the United States can no longer afford to be unconcerned about what other peoples think of us. * * * Its second assumption is that greater understanding abroad of this country—of its people, its actions, its institutions, and its policies—will help to improve relations between the United States and the rest of the world and help the cause of peace.

"Its third assumption is that the Government must take positive steps to make the United States more comprehensible abroad in those areas and in those media not adequately covered by private channels of information. * * * After allowing for exceptions, it is clearly desirable to provide other peoples with a steady flow of intelligible, accurate material which will enable them to see our national activities in their context; to see events in relation to national policies, policies in relation to their roots in national life; and our national life in relation to the lives of these other peoples. The more we can keep the background of American life in the foreground of other peoples' minds, the greater are the chances of better understanding and better relations between other peoples and the people of the United States."

The second was a discussion of semantics. Mr. Benton detected in the fullest known definition of the word "propaganda" (Herbert Klein, pamphlet, Propaganda: The War for Men's Minds), an unchangeably evil connotation resting on the will to distort, mislead, or hide the objective truth, wherefore Mr. Benton asked that this committee not apply this word to the OIC activity unless it discovered distortion, untruth, or hidden purpose in the activity. So far as it could go, the committee did not detect distortion, untruth, or hidden purpose in the activity to date, and inclined to Mr. Benton's request—though others interviewed by the committee did not.

THE GOVERNMENT'S OPERATIONS

Mr. Benton and the OIC staff exposed to the committee everything now done to disseminate, transmit, and circulate news, information, and opinion of and from the United States over the rest of the world. A summary of this activity:

To some extent, OIC has continued the pattern of the wartime disseminations by OWI and the Office of Inter-American Affairs. Total employed in the Government's operation on July 1, 1946, was 1,276 in this country and 1,895 abroad of which latter 372 are Americans.

Dissemination takes two physical forms: Through the daily voice of America and American hour broadcast, short-waved through stations leased during the war by the Government, and through distribution in foreign countries by OIC staffs which are part of the diplomatic and consular missions.

A parallel dissemination is carried on by wireless to our embassies daily for the use of the diplomatic and consular staff, some of which information is given to foreign agencies at the discretion of the embassies.

SCOPE OF OPERATIONS

The character of these distributions:

On a sample day, Voice of America was broadcast in English, French, German, Italian, Spanish, Yugoslav, Hungarian, Austrian, Czechoslovak, Polish, Rumanian, Bulgarian, Portuguese, Chinese, Siamese, Korean, Annamese, Malay, and Dutch. Broken into areas, 43 percent was waved to Latin-America, 33 percent to Europe, and 23 percent to the Orient (this latter known as the American Hour). Most of it is general entertainment and instruction, some of which is picked up from American radio-chain features. The United States news and opinion fraction of this averages 10 minutes per day to any country, or about 25 percent of the average broadcast.

For its news items on these broadcasts, OIC uses New York and Washington newspapers (for matter they originate themselves); International News Service, Reuters, Aneta, and information originating from Government departments. For opinion, it quotes from editorials and columnists appearing in nearly all metropolitan newspapers and magazines in this country. A large part of the so-called news element is in fact represented by these quotations from opinion writings.

MATERIAL CAREFULLY EDITED

OIC freely exposed its editing by selection. Mr. Benton, Mr. Hulten, and Mr. Hunt discussed with the committee at length the system of control of policy with which the entire organization is alerted. In the main, these controls of policy appear to depend on (1) disposition of the State Department to maintain America in its most favorable light; (2) confidential diplomatic information which might expand or qualify the aims of the disseminations; (3) purpose of remedying impressions of America in the minds of people abroad by supplemental information beyond the flow of American news from the private agencies, which the OIC spokesmen maintain must be necessarily piecemeal and therefore occasionally misleading as to the whole story. Examples of topics on which supplemental information has been deemed necessary in various foreign countries: Communist Party support of Mayor O'Dwyer in New York; the lot of the Negro in America; the United States divorce rate; full texts of President Truman's and Secretary Byrnes' statements on international matters.

The committee asked many questions about these controls and were furnished with samples of them as they are circulated in the State Department. One of the committee's hypothetical questions was, Would not a wicked national administration use this form of dissemination of fact and information thus shaped by these controls to a harmful use? The OIC spokesmen replied that any wicked administration would do far more dangerous things on other parts of the diplomatic fronts; and that any virtuous minority in Congress, during wicked administrations, could readily expose such depravity.

FOREIGN STAFFS SERVICED

Through the embassies, OIC furnishes foreign press generally with official United States documents and texts; special articles, both solicited and unsolicited by the foreign consumers, on many phases of American life and government; photographs and mats either to accompany these or to be a separate representation of American affairs; Amerika, a magazine published especially for Russian readers, which has been permitted a circulation of 50,000 by the Soviet Government; documentary films, mainly those produced during the war period by OWI and other Government agencies; selected news reels from commercial production; poster news bulletins for largely illiterate people; and a three-times-a-week English-language newspaper in the Philippines.

The daily wireless information service for the diplomatic and consular staffs includes about 1,500 words of news and editorial opinion.

EFFECTIVENESS OF GOVERNMENT DISSEMINATION

The committee's inquiries on this point naturally ran into the field of claims and opinion. OIC presented evidence from a field worker that American information bureaus in Belgrade and Bucharest brought into Yugoslavia and Rumania the only public information about America that was true and unwarped, and offered to multiply these examples elsewhere over the world.

Our private news agencies are not in use in the iron-curtain lands and a great deal else of the world, and here OIC underscored the argument that it alone could function behind diplomatic protection and get some public attention for American truth and fact, however small.

Another staff man reported on penetration of interior China by OIC information exclusively.

RECORD IMPRESSIVE

The record was impressive of the usage of United States texts and special articles in the press of Egypt, England, Italy, France, Sweden, Brazil, Chile, Argentina, China, India, and Indochina—all these furnished by OIC.

Questions as to reception to the Voice of America—American hour broadcasts received answers necessarily based on surmise. It is true that short-wave receiving sets are the popular European type. One statistic was given the committee of 100,000 such sets, in whatever condition, in Yugoslavia, of which 25,000 were in Belgrade. Foreign listeners have advised our diplomatic agencies of their views of the broadcasts, indicating they are listened to. No claims were made for much radio reception in China, save in the seacoast cities.

Private news agency executives expressed skepticism as to net total effectiveness of the Government's activity, and raised the issue, noted further, of normal distrust of governmentally disseminated and branded information by the consumer listener or reader.

COMMERCIAL SERVICE DOES NOT REACH MILLIONS

OIC argued the evident fact that the American private news services do not reach millions in many parts of the world. The OIC spokesman also asserted that the private news flow must be miscellaneous and without national purpose and that therefore (1) the news services do not regularly carry important United States official texts, (2) are frequently too unrelated to local knowledge to be completely comprehensible to the non-American consumer of news, (3) may accomplish disservice to American interests without fully realizing it or its extent.

OIC cited its penetration of the Balkans as the most effective sample of its operation—in the absence, or nearly complete absence, of private United States news services—though actual news dissemination there is necessarily small in numbers attracted.

One rebuttal by the private news agency executives was that, being a Government operation, the OIC procedure in the Balkans and other foreign nations may be or become needlessly irritating to the Government and a large number of the people of those countries.

PRIVATE AGENCIES DO NOT DO JOB

Mr. Benton presented a round-up from 21 United States diplomatic missions, 17 of whose chiefs pronounced themselves dissatisfied with the effectiveness of the private American news services in their particular foreign nations. Principal complaints were two: "Do not present clear picture of American way of life," and "Do not carry sufficient textual material for presenting official American viewpoint.

To the first of these complaints, AP and UP executives retorted that the newspapers of America doubtless did not present too clear an account of the Chinese, British, French, Russian ways of life, either, and hardly considered it their function. As to the texts they reported that there was small usage of those which they had carried to other lands, indicating no great interest by press and broadcasters there.

Mr. Cornish, of the committee, had opportunity this summer to make inquiries in England and France as to effectiveness of OIC disseminations and reported learning of considerable attention to them.

Mr. Berkson, of INS, furnished an informal report on effectiveness of OIC in the opinion of his service's bureaus in Berlin, Frankfurt, Vienna, Madrid, and Rome, cabled to him for this committee's use. These correspondents reported evidences that large numbers in those countries listened to the Voice of America broadcasts with some regularity; also some evidences of listener skepticism and governmental irritation (notably in Spain).

OPPOSITION OF THE PRIVATE NEWS AGENCIES

Reference has been made to skepticism about OIC by the news service executives interviewed. The position of the United Press and the Associated Press in withdrawing their services from State Department use is well known through their public statements. There was little disposition on the part of State Department officials interviewed to reopen consideration of that issue. (OIC, in fact, told the committee that its operation has survived the loss.)

Mr. Cooper, of the AP, and Mr. Johnson, of the UP flatly opposed any Government news dissemination. They regard Government proprietorship as certain to cause any dissemination to be regarded by peoples of the world as propaganda in its full cynical form, and do not believe the Government could possibly fulfill the purposes stated by Mr. Benton. They are equally positive that the tested trust of people everywhere in the factual integrity and lack of nationalistic purpose of the private American press service gives these the only and the traditional opportunity to set the United States squarely, with rugged objectivity, before the rest of the world.

Mr. Howard of Scripps Howard saw no objection to a Government operation making available a report limited to text of official documents and statements for any who might care to call for it at our diplomatic posts, but protested the Government engaging in a "world-wide high-speed distribution of a general news report along the lines of that put out by the American press associations."

Mr. Cooper appealed: "Keep the AP out of world politics as it has been kept out of national politics, and the AP's strength will defend us all. Don't drag the AP into any contest between this country and Russia." He believed the day will come when the Russian people will demand news by tested private agencies known for news integrity.

Mr. Cooper referred to an attempt after the First World War to have the Government's public information activity continued because of the stress of that period, and to President Wilson's decision not to continue it. It was his opinion that the British and French Governments would have been happy to drop their present postwar information disseminations had the United States Government indicated it would do so.

INS POSITION CLARIFIED

Mr. Johnson said: "In our function as a world news service, we can be no more nationalistic about American news that we can be pro-British about British Empire news, pro-Indian about India news, or pro-Russian about Russian news."

Mr. Berkson of INS, which is being sold to OIC, assured the committee this relationship indicated no disagreement with the stands taken by UP and AP and had no more permanence of policy than its 30-day cancellation condition would indicate. INS, said Mr. Berkson, feels as strongly as AP and UP on the subject of Government propaganda and any participation therein by the United States news agencies. "With equal sincerity," he added, "we feel that if [American news] services can continue to be furnished for the time being to foreign governments for practical reasons of expediency or otherwise, there is some merit in considering the emergency confronting the United States Government and in recognizing that it may have special needs of a temporary emergency nature which we have a moral obligation to meet."

The committee is convinced that honest differences of opinion existed among news agencies as to whether they should supply their news reports to the Government for distribution under its auspices. It believes that the United Press and the Associated Press were motivated by a sincere concern for integrity in news dissemination in their declination to continue to supply news to the State Department for this purpose. It is equally convinced that International News Service was similarly motivated in its decision to continue on a temporary emergency basis its service to the Government.

The committee learned that a group in the State Department favors taking the operating responsibility for short wave voice broadcasting out of the Department and setting it up in an independent organization.

NEWS DISSEMINATION BY OTHER GOVERNMENTS

The committee was reminded by State Department officials and others that Russia, England, and France are now engaged in expanded news and propaganda efforts over the world. The Russian news service Tass, a governmental arm, has a near monopoly of the press and broadcast outlets in the Balkans and the Near East, and Russian Information Service has penetrated the United States, Mexico and Latin America. British Information Service now is furnishing 7,000 words of news and comment and a photographic service to South American countries and others. L'Agence Francaise, under the restored French Government, gives news by daily broadcast to Europe and other parts of the world, including South America.

The committee noted the decision of the British Government this summer to maintain British Broadcasting Corp. as a large disseminator of news of English and European origin, tied closely into national policy.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Reese of the committee advances the argument that, agreeing to the necessity that "the American side of the world picture be disseminated as widely as possible," only the National Government has the means to do this in any major operation. "I am convinced," says Mr. Reese, "private enterprise cannot and will not undertake this mission. * * * I am in favor of supporting strongly adequate congressional appropriations for the continuance of the State Department project."

Mr. Cornish, of the committee, believes: "Where they are permitted to operate or where they find it financially possible to operate the private press services can, I think, do a better job of distributing day to day news than could any Government agency, even in these areas. I think our diplomatic agencies can properly distribute texts of documents and background material to newspapers and radio stations. In the vast areas where the press services do not operate, I think the State Department should by all available means present American news."

Mr. Owens, of the committee, says: "The United States Government has not only the right but the obligation to inform the peoples of the world about its official policies. This obligation is strongest in those countries where the news agencies are least effective, for whatever reason. In carrying out this obligation, the Government should entrust this task to the best-equipped men it can find. * * * They should confine themselves as far as possible to the exposition of the exact policies of the Government, giving such background material as may be necessary to make these policies understandable. When the Government goes beyond these limits, it enters a dangerous field."

Mrs. Hobby, of the committee, says: "As strong nationalistic spheres begin to be everywhere apparent, it now seems necessary to portray the beginning and evolution of a self-governing people. If we consider world dissemination of news in the sense of United States news and more specifically the news of a self-governing people, we must admit that such a step is radical and perhaps dangerous extension of the powers of the United States Government. I cannot recall a problem about which I have had as many conflicting responses. * * * I am compelled to the conclusion that words are weapons in the contest of ideologists. * * * I have arrived at the conclusion that we must use the potentially powerful supplement of self-portrayal and interpretation. I abhor the necessity for it and despise the doing, but if such a program can be effective—or even partly so—it may be a partial peace insurance."

Mr. McKelway, of the committee, says: "It is to be doubted whether a really effective program of this kind—designed to create friendly sentiment toward the United States by people of other lands—can be conducted by a Government agency which at the same time meets the standards in straight news presentation generally demanded in this country. If it is necessary to win friends and influence people abroad by Government broadcasts of news and opinion, let us frankly recognize the Government's program as an experience in propaganda and not confuse that program with the dissemination of untainted news."

Mr. James, of the committee, declaring the Government dissemination proposition "comes nearer a 51–49 proposition than anything I have been up against; I feel I could write a very good brief in defense of either side," adds: "There is something distasteful to me about any program of offsetting the bad with the good, because, when the bad happens one day, that is the day's news, and when the good happens another day, that is that day's new. Insofar as he might explain conditions here in commentaries or by quoting editorials, much could be said for that, but I am far from sure Mr. Benton's news broadcast will be as objective as he indicates.

"No responsible person would object to the libraries of information maintained by the State Department abroad and to its distribution of documentary material through the embassies. The chief argument here is obviously the distribution of spot news—there is no room for argument about much else."

Mr. Seymour, of the committee, says: "All that issues from the United States of America to foreign lands is propaganda, whether it be a farm implement or a motorcar, a motion picture or a package of old clothing, a missionary's toil, or an emigrant's letter home. These have been effective propaganda because they have not been propaganda. Our stature in the world is a measure of our merit and their effectiveness.

"Engagement in deliberate propaganda (in the purest sense) can only weaken our world position; the fact that other nations do it only underscores the point. Certainly our State Department ought effectively to acquaint other peoples with our official policies and significant expositions of them—adequately interpreted. To do more is to engage in propaganda in the sense which Mr. Benton commendably deplores."

The committee is in complete agreement with the State Department's distribution of official texts and operation of the libraries of American books and sources all over the world.

The committee, by unanimous vote, presents this final conclusion:

"The present uncertainties in international relations justify an effort by the United States Government to make its activities and its policies clear to the people of the world through the agency set up in the State Department. Your committee recognizes, however, the dangers inherent in government dissemination of news and suggests that the society appoint a special committee to review at intervals the work of the State Department agency and make its findings available to the membership."

Respectfully,

N. R. Howard, chairman, editor, Cleveland News; George Cornish, managing editor, New York Herald Tribune; Oveta Culp Hobby, executive editor, Houston Post; Edwin L. James, managing editor, New York Times; Ben M. McKelway, associate editor, Washington Star; Hamilton Owens, editor, Baltimore Sun; Ben Reese, managing editor, St. Louis Post-Dispatch; Gideon Seymour, executive editor, Cowles Newspapers, Minneapolis.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I insert the exchange of letters between myself and Secretary Byrnes last summer, together with the introductory matter which accompanied them, just as it appeared in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 92, part 12, page A4891:

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, there are always a few willing to make any kind of charge, no matter how wild, unfounded, or dangerous in order to gain publicity. Some months ago I heard with concern some very sweeping statements to the effect that the State Department was honeycombed with communistically inclined employees who had pro-Russian sympathies; but I did not see any proof.

Having known the honorable the Secretary of State, Mr. James F. Byrnes, of South Carolina, for many years, and having known the Honorable Cordell Hull and the Honorable Edward Stettinius, former Secretaries of State, it seemed to me unreasonable to believe that any one of them would permit the employment in the State Department of any person whose fundamental loyalty to the United States could be, in the least degree, questioned.

COULD BE SMOKE SCREEN

It seems to me, in fact, that the loose charges being made might in truth be coming, indirectly, from sources which might be very much interested in throwing up a smoke screen of Red-baiting in order to hide a movement of growing strength to forgive our defeated enemies, the Germans, and to force out of the State Department individuals who would not view with favor the restoration of Nazi power.

To any pro-German groups or individuals who would favor soft treatment for the Nazis any kind of antifascism or antinazism would be assailed as procommunism, for people like that cannot understand nor appreciate the democratic foundations of the American way of life, nor believe in loyalty to America first, last, and always.

ONLY 40 TERMINATED

To ascertain the true facts, therefore, in fairness to all Government employees and to the State Department, I wrote to the Secretary of State making inquiry about these charges, and his reply is so illuminating that I am impelled to place his letter as well as my letter to him in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for all to read.

Please note, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary reports that out of 3,000 individuals whose records have been carefully scrutinized, not hundreds, but only 40 have been terminated for security reasons.

For the same security reasons, Mr. Byrnes does not specify the precise nature of the reasons for discharge, but he gives no evidence that anyone was communistically inclined, and as I have said many times, these wild and reckless statements made on the floor and in newspapers are to be regretted. They were made, in my belief, to create prejudice in the public mind, and to discredit the administration; and I have no doubt that many of the cries of Communist infiltration actually came from individuals who had been turned down because of their German Nazi or Fascist connections.

MAY 24, 1946.

Hon. JAMES F. BYRNES,
Secretary of State, Department of State, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: It has been charged freely on the floor of the House by some Members that hundreds, if not thousands, of employees have been eliminated from the State Department by the screening committee because of communistic leanings or activities or membership. In the interest of fair play, I most respectfully request that you inform me on these facts:

1. How many employees actually were examined and their records and applications reviewed?

2. How many were separated from service and for what reasons, by categories?

3. Of those separated, how many actually were found to have political disability, and of what nature, strong enough to be the principal basis of their separations?

4. Specifically, how many were found to have Communist or communistic affiliations, and how many Nazi and Fascist affiliations, and was any investigation made of pro-Nazi or pro-Fascist sympathies or allegiances?

5. Who were the members of the screening committee, how were they designated, and, in broad terms, what were their criteria?

I ask this information in the interest of the thousands and thousands of hard-working Government employees in whom I have every trust and confidence, and of whom I believe at least 99 percent are loyal American citizens. Some recent statements that have been made to create resentment and prejudice and reflect against the Department of State have actually had the effect of casting reflections upon the loyalty of employees and former employees most unfairly and unjustly, and I think a full statement of the true facts will correct many general misapprehensions.

Respectfully yours,

A. J. SABATH,
Member of Congress.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 26, 1946.

DEAR ADOLPH: I have yours of May 24 expressing your concern with respect to certain allegations made on the floor of the House to the effect that "hundreds if not thousands of employees have been eliminated from the State Department by the screening committee because of communistic leanings or activities or membership." Such statements are incorrect and do a grave injustice not only to the employees of the Department but to Government employees as a whole, the great majority of whom are loyal American citizens. I therefore welcome this opportunity to answer your specific questions in the order in which they are presented.

(1) Pursuant to Executive order, approximately 4,000 employees have been transferred to the Department of State from various war agencies such as the OSS, FEA, OWI, OIAA, etc. Of these 4,000 employees, the case histories of approximately 3,000 have been subjected to a preliminary examination, as a result of which a recommendation against permanent employment has been made in 285 cases by the screening committee to which you refer in your letter.

(2) Of the 285 individuals who have been the subject of adverse recommendation as indicated in (1), above, the services of 79 have been terminated.

(3) Of the 79 actually separated from the service, 26 were aliens and therefore under "political disability" with respect to employment in the peacetime operations of the Department. I assume that factor alone could be considered the principal basis for their separation.

(4) With respect to the 79 thus separated, the following break-down is submitted:

Aliens	26
Failure to comply with foreign-service regulations, such as citizenship, for 15 years prior to foreign assignment and other reasons disqualifying the individual for service abroad	13
Close connections or involvement with foreign governments or their organs, past records indicating a high degree of security risk, etc	40
Total	79

The Department is equally concerned with disclosing subversive activities or associations of all kinds whether Communist, Nazi, or Fascist, in any employees present or prospective.

(5) Because of the security considerations involved in the mission of the screening committee, I do not feel at liberty to disclose publicly the identity of its membership. This committee, incidentally, has no power or authority to eliminate anyone from employment in the State Department. It simply makes recommendations which the Assistant Secretary for Administration may accept or reject in whole or in part in the light of all the relevant evidence.

I hope what I have said above corrects any misapprehensions which you may have entertained as to the Department's personnel policy. Like any other administrative mechanism, it is not perfect. However, I am entirely clear that it has been fair to the Department's employees in its operation. It is my firm intention to see that it remains fair.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES F. BYRNES.

GERHARD EISLER AND THE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I presume these comments might better have been made to the Members of the Seventy-ninth Congress and not only to Members of the Eightieth Congress because the majority of those who led the fight last year to handicap, harass, and handcuff the activities of the House Committee on Un-American Activities were defeated at the polls by the voters last November as they should have been.

I think it is well, however, to call to the attention of the House the highly important hearings held in the Eisler case by the House Committee on Un-American Activities last week. We hope to make them available to every Member of the House by the time you are asked to vote on the citation for contempt proceedings which will be before us at an early date.

The Eisler case clearly demonstrates certain things, but the most important is the tremendous amount of work still to be done in weeding Communists out of positions of importance in this country. I think the facts revealed in the Eisler case alone more than justify ten times over all the expenditures that have been made by the Congress for the maintenance of the House Committee on Un-American Activities ever since Martin Dies originated it some 9 years ago. I urge you to read carefully the dramatic, significant, and tremendously important information in these hearings from the standpoint of the security of this Republic.

Had it not been that the patriotic Members of this House have supported the work of its Committee on Un-American Activities all through the years, Herr Eisler would now be operating in Europe with the important information on atomic warfare and on the other subjects to which he devoted his nefarious espionage activities while in America. Had the enemies of this committee, and those who have trumped up one pretext after another for opposing its works, criticizing its methods, crippling its functions, voting against the contempt citations it has been forced to bring to Congress, and attempting to deny it adequate or effective funds, been successful in their efforts to destroy or defeat the House Committee on Un-American Activities, Communists would now be enjoying an even greater heyday of freedom in and out of this Government than is true today.

Had those who give lip service to the denunciation of communism in this country but who write and work and vote against the only agency of Congress with authority to circumvent communistic activities been able to terminate the work of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, men like Marzeni would still hold high positions of confidence in the State Department, and Gerhard Eisler, who once served Hitler as an operative in France and now serves Stalin as an international transmission agent for Moscow, directives would still be undeterred in their plots and plans to undermine freedom and democracy. So these remarks are just to say, "Thank you, my colleagues," to those of you—and that means the big majority on both sides of the aisle—who have had courage enough to stand up to be counted when the chips were down and votes were being held which would either support or undermine the important work of the Committee on Un-American Activities. It has not always been popular to support this committee but it has always been good Americanism.

We expect to be before you soon for authority to greatly expand our staff of committee investigators and research assistants. If we are to do the job required, we shall need your assistance and cooperation on this matter. I feel confident that this support will be forthcoming from the great majority of Members of the Eightieth Congress.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BUSBEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address by Morgan L. Fitch, of Chicago, on assuming the presidency of the National Association of Real Estate Boards on January 29, 1947.

LOYALTY OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I did not hear all of the remarks by my good friend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX]. I did hear the conclusion of his remarks, and I concur in them most heartily. My good friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] says he is going to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD comments by certain editors; I assume New Deal editors whitewashing Mr. Lilienthal. I wish to call attention to the fact that New Deal columnists and commentators during the past few days have had much to say about various events, but not one word against Ger Eisler, the Communist spy, who was before the House Committee on Un-American Activities. That was the most important and significant event in this country during the past week. So far as the loyalty or disloyalty of Mr. Lilienthal is concerned, I am not going to dwell on that, but I think it is high time that the Government establish a sound policy in regard to this question of loyalty. The Government should not be put in a position of proving a person disloyal. No one should be given a position of high responsibility in the Federal Government if his loyalty to our Government and Constitution is in question. Any question of doubt should be resolved in favor of the Government.

HOOF-AND-MOUTH DISEASE IN MEXICO

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I am sure all the people in Pennsylvania join with the gentleman from Indiana in wanting to have the Federal Government withdraw from the State—in other words, push it back to Washington where it belongs. While the gentleman from Texas thinks we are wrong, I want to ask him a very pertinent question: Whether he and the other Texas livestock men would not feel much more secure today concerning the hoof-and-mouth disease which is now raging in Mexico if they had the State legislature and the veterinarians of Texas fighting the disease rather than to have the Department of Agriculture from Washington building a wire fence along the border to keep it out, as is being suggested.

Mr. RAYBURN. The trouble is that the State of Texas is not prepared for it and neither the State of Texas nor any other State is going to be prepared to fight this disease.

Mr. GROSS. You will admit that the wire fence which has been suggested by the Government here in Washington will not keep the hoof-and-mouth disease out. I want to be properly understood. I know enough about foot-and-mouth disease, having lived through it, that I want it stamped out in Mexico. But there is only one way to do it, and that is, to do it right, and a wire fence will not do it. If the Mexican Government wants our help sufficiently that they will cooperate to the extent that they will allow us to manage the program, I believe it can be cleaned out now cheaper than to fight it in our own country later on. As far as soil conservation is concerned, some good has been done. It has been sold to the farmers sufficiently that if they want it they will carry it on if the Federal Government is withdrawn. If it is good for the Federal Government to pay the farmer for digging ditches in his fields and rearranging his fields, it is a better thing for the Federal Government to pay him to paint his buildings, because nothing is better than well-kept buildings to strengthen a farmer's credit and prestige.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROSS] has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BUFFETT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article from the Washington News.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution passed by the Indiana State Legislature.

Mr. BREHM asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

THE BOXCAR SHORTAGE

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call to your attention a real emergency that now exists in the Eastern and East Central States. Industries are closing, thousands of workers are being forced to remain idle, and various programs so essential to our economic life are being halted. Especially is the housing program for veterans being penalized.

This emergency is caused by boxcar shortage, a condition which results from a recent mandatory directive issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Office of Defense Transportation, and compels the railroad companies to deliver to the Chicago area a minimum of 1,500 or 1,600 empty boxcars per day for distribution to Western States. A "rob Peter to pay Paul" program. This directive makes it mandatory for the railroad companies to haul boxcars empty from the East through the areas where plants are closed and men are forced to be idle because this order will not allow these cars to be loaded en route, although a large percentage of the products to be loaded in these cars is to be shipped to the general areas where the empty boxcars are going.

Mr. Speaker, because of this emergency, which is growing to larger proportions every day, I respectfully call upon the proper standing committee of the House—which I understand is the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, under the capable leadership of Hon. CHARLES WOLVERTON—to immediately investigate this directive and the conditions involved, so that a more equitable distribution of the equipment at hand can be made.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

THE LATE HONORABLE OSCAR CALLAWAY

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, there are a few Members of this body who served with the Honorable Oscar Callaway in the period from 1910 to 1916. You will regret to learn of his death on January 31 last in Comanche, Tex., from where he was elected to Congress in 1910, serving what was then the Twelfth District.

Turning back the pages of the record of this House we find he was a leader in establishing the Federal Reserve Bank System, a member of the House Naval Affairs Committee, and vigorously opposed certain measures which he believed would draw this country into World War I.

I personally knew Mr. Callaway for more than 20 years and had occasion to see him recently. He was stern in his admonitions, willing and liberal in his compliments, and reflected rugged honesty and deep conviction in his opinions.

I am sure the membership of this House join me in expressions of sympathy to his family and friends, adding the hope that those who are deeply affected by his passing may find solace in realms beyond the touch of human effort.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleague and good friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], in expressing my deep sympathy to the family of the late Oscar Callaway, once a Member of this House.

Oscar Callaway and I graduated in the same class at the University of Texas. I knew him intimately. As a college student he developed a great capacity for leadership. He was a man of fine habits, splendid ability, and high integrity. His courage knew no bounds. Nobody ever had any trouble in knowing how Oscar Callaway stood on any important question. His frankness did not always bring him political success, but he always fought for his convictions. He and I did not always agree on political issues, but I placed a high value on his friendship. He will be missed not only by his family but by his many friends in this House, where he served for several years, and by his countless friends all over Texas.

COMMUNISM IN THE TVA

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, I do not feel called upon to come to the defense of Mr. Lilienthal. Though I know of no reason why his patriotism should be challenged, he seems fully capable of defending himself. And, besides, that is a question for the Senate to determine.

However, I do regret the remark of my distinguished and able friend from Georgia, whom I love and honor, that the TVA is a hotbed of communism. We people who live in the area and who are served by that agency, know better.

As typical of some of the unfortunate remarks and to show how some people have been hurt by irresponsible charges that have been made, I want to relate to you a thing that happened last week before a committee of another body. One of our colleagues, the distinguished and able gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JENNINGS] was testifying. A member of the other body asked the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JENNINGS] about a boy named Buck Borah. I thought his reply was so impressive that I wrote it down. He said: "Senator, I heard Mr. Clapp say that Borah lost his life in the defense of his country. It looks like his blood might wash away whatever taint there may have been attached to him."

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GORE. I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. COX. Permit me to make just this brief observation: I hope the gentleman will not let his doubts of the information upon which my statement was based trouble him. If he wants me to spread the information upon the records of the House I shall be glad to accommodate him.

Mr. GORE. If the gentleman has reliable information regarding un-American activities in any Government activity he not only has my wishes that he do so but it is his duty to spread it upon the public record.

I have not heard any charge that any person now employed by the TVA, from elevator operator to members of the board, is now or ever has been a Communist. I take it that in the employment of the several thousands of employees who from time to time have been employed by the TVA some mistakes have been made. It would be most unusual if this were not true.

Some several years ago the so-called Dies committee made an investigation of alleged communism in the agency but the chairman of the subcommittee who made the investigation, our former colleague, the Honorable Joe Starnes, has testified that he was in no way disturbed by the findings. It should be noted that since that time various appropriation bills and legislative proposals regarding the TVA, including the renomination of David Lilienthal to be a member of the board, has been before the Congress, but the RECORD does not show any reference to communism in the TVA in the consideration of any of these matters. I wonder why there is now so much to do about something which several years ago even the Dies committee thought inconsequential.

I have recently noticed reports that an alleged Communist is to be prosecuted for illegally concealing his identity in order to obtain employment in the Department of State. If true, this was an unfortunate mistake, but I have not heard, and I hope I do not hear anyone attempt to blacken the name of the former great Secretary of State, the Honorable Cordell Hull, or to besmirch the Department of State because of this error.

All subversive elements in the Government should be expelled; must be rooted out. But, Mr. Speaker, let us be careful lest we besmirch the good name of innocent, patriotic American citizens.

Mr. COX. The statement made that communism flourished under the nose of Mr. Lilienthal is well-advised.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes today following the other special orders.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

MEXICO AND THE FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE OF CATTLE

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, several emergencies have been brought to your attention this morning, but I am bringing to your attention a very important matter and a great emergency—the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Mexico.

I have this morning introduced a bill to deal with this situation. I also wish to call to the attention of the House the fact that hearings will be held at 4 o'clock this afternoon in the House Agricultural Committee on the current outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Mexico.

Under the present statutes, the Department of Agriculture has authority to cooperate informally with foreign governments in suppressing outbreaks of this dread disease. Present authority, however, does not extend to engaging in eradication processes on a substantial scale, even when requested to do so by foreign officials. This legislation has been introduced at the request of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Mexican-United States Agricultural Commission, based on findings of a joint Mexico-United States Veterinary Survey Committee which has just completed a survey in Mexico. Do not forget the time of these hearings—4 p. m. today in Agriculture Committee, room 1310.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to express rather an audacious opinion, I presume, but to the House of Representatives comes first the duty of writing a tax bill as well as the consideration of tariff and reciprocal trade agreements.

I am sorry that another body has done such a prodigious amount of meddling on those subjects prematurely.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

[Mr. McDONOUGH addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

INDIANA AND FEDERAL AID

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, during the next fiscal year the United States Treasury will pay out for the benefit of and directly to the citizens of the State of Indiana literally hundreds of millions of dollars. It will pay out millions of dollars in old-age assistance, millions of dollars for other social-security benefits to the citizens of Indiana. It will pay out much, much money for flood control; it will pay many, many millions of dollars to the veterans of the Second World War from the State of Indiana.

I wonder how the Indiana delegation and the Indiana Legislature feel about those expenditures out of the Treasury of the United States. It sounds very well to pass a resolution that they do not want any Federal help, but let them get down to the practical basis of refusing that help; then we will know how they really feel.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of this House to the fact, and it is a fact because I have kept track of it for over 25 years, that the State of Illinois pays into the Federal Treasury between five and six dollars for every dollar it gets back in every shape, kind, or form, of Federal subsidy and Federal aid. The State of Indiana probably pays in between three and four dollars, the State of Michigan $5, the State of Pennsylvania between eight and ten dollars, and the State of New York some $12 for every dollar it gets back.

It is a mighty good thing for these States to now realize that they better stand on their own feet and pay their own way and keep their dollars at home.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FISHER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement made before the Committee on Reciprocity Information.

FEDERAL AID TO STATES

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I would think that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, a member of the Ways and Means Committee, would have limited his remarks quite materially because as a member of that great committee he certainly knows that so far as social-security payments are concerned for unemployment compensation, for old age survivors insurance, and for the payment of administration of the employment services in all of the States, every dollar of that money is provided by taxes levied upon the pay rolls produced in those States and funneled into the Federal Treasury. There is a great segment of our economy thinking in this country that believes the time has come when we should permit the States to levy and collect their own taxes for those purposes and to handle and administer those programs as they are doing under existing law.

It seems to me that we should rather be inclined to eliminate the items which I have referred to from the discussion at hand. As to the payment to veterans, that is a Federal responsibility and the Federal Government ought to take care of the veterans.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

AMENDING RULE XI (1) (H) OF THE RULES OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES (RELATING TO THE COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS)

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 90 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That rule XI (1) (h) of the Rules of the House of Representatives (relating to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(3) For the purpose of performing such duties the committee, or any subcommittee thereof when authorized by the committee, is authorized to sit, hold hearings, and act at such times and places within the United States, whether or not the House is in session, is in recess, or has adjourned, to employ such experts, special counsel, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such papers, documents, and books, and to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures within the amount authorized or appropriated as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or of any subcommittee, or by any member designated by any such chairman, and may be served by any person designated by any such chairman or member."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 6, strike out the word "committee," and insert "committee."

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ALLEN of Illinois:

On page 1, line 10, after the word "adjourned", strike out "to employ such experts, special counsel, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants."

Page 2, line 2, after the word "testimony", strike out the comma and the words "to have such printing and binding done and to make such expenditures within the amount authorized or appropriated."

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the amendment I have just sent to the desk, and which you heard read, is to protect the jurisdiction of the Committee on House Administration. As the Members are aware, the Committee on House Administration has jurisdiction over the personnel in the House as well as in committees. In the past it also has had jurisdiction over printing and binding.

By the adoption of this amendment those powers will be kept within the Committee on House Administration where they rightfully belong. The Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments can go before the Committee on House Administration and obtain this necessary help, stenographic assistants, experts, and so forth, if they can show good reason therefor.

This resolution authorizes the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments to appoint subcommittees to investigate Federal policies, personnel needs and practices, and other aspects of the Federal Government as the need arises, or as the committee deems necessary or advisable. It gives the committee power to subpena such papers, documents and books, and to take such testimony as may be necessary to execute the duties with which they are entrusted. This power is obviously necessary for the committee if it is to execute its responsibilities. Both sides of the aisle are interested in promoting increased efficiency in the Federal bureaus, and there should be little opposition to this resolution which is designed to locate and eliminate the bottlenecks that now stymie the effectuation of the laws passed by Congress.

When the Democratic administration assumed office on March 4, 1933, there were approximately 530,000 Federal employees. We have seen that number increase constantly, although the New Deal popularized itself by promising the elimination of superfluous Federal personnel and a 25-percent reduction in governmental expenditures. There are now more than 2,250,000 civilian employees in the Federal Government, and we are told they are all necessary in the operation of the executive departments. Last year salaries for civilian employees in the Federal Government exceeded $6,400,000,000. Unlike New Dealers, the Republicans intend to fulfill their promise to the voters and cut personnel and expenditures to the operating minimum.

The Expenditures Committee, if granted the power, can dig into the policies and the general set-up of various departments, bureaus, and agencies. By eliminating wasteful policies and procedures and overlapping operations the committee can possibly save hundreds of millions of dollars now being spent unnecessarily.

One of the first acts of the committee would be to investigate and attempt to remedy the notorious waste and inefficiency in the War Assets Administration. The run-around given to citizens trying to do business under the lopsided conditions established by special regulations issued by that agency would be remedied. The committee could also hear and act upon complaints of private citizens who have suffered injustices from bureaucrats. As they cannot be removed from office, even by the will of the people, these bureaucrats can now be as high-handed as they wish, without fear of reprisal.

Too many of them ignore the Constitution and the laws passed by Congress and invade the rights of the people. They should be made to understand that they are servants of the people and not their masters. Now is the time for a revaluation of the purposes and limitations of this Government, before the people become so accustomed to governmental confusion, that they regard as normal the regimentation of war and the bureaucratic methods that grew up under the New Deal.

We have given the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments great responsibilities, and we expect them to play a large role in returning this country to a system of sensible government. Now we must give them the power to fulfill the obligations that have been placed upon them. And that is exactly what House Resolution 90 is designed to do. I recommend its passage.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JUDD. Will the gentleman advise us whether the amendment he just offered is his own amendment or an amendment by the Committee on Rules?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. The amendment I just offered was offered as an amendment by the chairman of the Committee on Rules with the approval of the members of the Committee on Rules which I spoke to personally.

Mr. JUDD. So the committee discussed it and approved the amendment which the gentleman just offered.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. It was approved by the individual members which I talked to.

Mr. JUDD. But the resolution as reported out by the Committee on Rules did not have that amendment in it.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. That is correct, sir.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

NO NEW DEAL EDITORS ON COMMITTEE

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, in the first place I want to congratulate the chairman of the Committee on Rules, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN], on offering the amendment.

Before I speak on the resolution, however, I desire merely to make this observation. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUSBEY], who followed me, or shortly thereafter, tried to make it appear that the report that I asked to be printed as coming from newspaper editors, was prefaced by New Deal editors or leaders. I wish to say that he is in error. This is a report made by independent editors from eight nationally known papers and has met with general approval on the part of the press of the United States which, after reading the report from this independent committee, realized and recognized that the attacks that have been made on the information program of the State Department were not justified; that they were unwarranted; and that the matter should be made clear to the country. This report which I am inserting in the RECORD merely sets out the facts and the findings without change on my part, except to omit footnotes to save space. I have neither amended, strengthened, nor weakened the report. Indeed, it needs no strengthening. The facts and the statements speak for themselves, and I urge all those who so frequently have attacked and assailed the State Department to read it for themselves.

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BUSBEY. The question of whether editors are independent editors or New Deal editors, is that not a matter of one's own opinion and judgment?

Mr. SABATH. They were not selected by any New Dealers but were appointed by the president of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, Mr. Wilbur Forrest, of the New York Herald Tribune. I doubt that even the gentleman from Illinois would call the New York Herald Tribune, which has been practically an official organ of the Republican Party for many years, a New Deal newspaper. For the benefit of the gentleman, I repeat the names of the eight editors who composed the committee, and of the newspapers which they represented. You will note that only the Houston Post could be called a Democratic newspaper; only the St. Louis Post-Dispatch a genuinely liberal and independent newspaper, and that none of these newspapers has been a strong supporter of the New Deal, at least in the last 2 years, while all had criticized the State Department's information program.

These are the names of the editors, with their papers:

N. R. Howard, chairman, editor, Cleveland News.

George Cornish, managing editor, New York Herald Tribune.

Oveta Culp Hobby, executive editor, Houston Post.

Edwin L. James, managing editor, New York Times.

Ben M. McKelway, associate editor, Washington Star.

Hamilton Owens, editor, Baltimore Sun papers.

Ben Reece, managing editor, St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Gideon Seymour, executive editor, Minneapolis Star-Journal.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. In talking about newspapers and what party they support, my recollection is that at least 84 percent of the newspapers of the country are Republican; certainly not Democratic.

Mr. SABATH. There is no question but what the gentleman is right.

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. BUSBEY. I would just like to ask if these editors are among the 84 percent that he classifies as Republican?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; most of them are. They represent the big newspapers. The big, moneyed newspapers are all Republican, we know that, and the gentleman knows that because he is a pretty intelligent man and he is in contact with them very often.

Mr. Speaker, as to the resolution, I congratulate the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] in offering the amendment. For the information of the House I wish to say that originally the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] introduced Resolution No. 71 for this purpose, but later on he introduced a resolution embodying the provision for the hiring of experts and employees, and so on, which no doubt would call for tremendous expenditures.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. How would the expenditure that the gentleman is talking about compare with the money that was spent at the time he was on that committee?

Mr. SABATH. Oh.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Oh; I guess so.

Mr. SABATH. Wait a second, for every dollar that committee of mine spent we saved the bondholders of the United States thousands of dollars. There is no question but that it was the most efficient investigation that was ever conducted by a congressional committee. The amount expended was indeed only a small portion of the amount of money that should have been spent and could have been spent if all the facts had been brought before the American people. Nevertheless, we succeeded in passing two acts which have been beneficial to the investors of this country. I regret that we were unable to secure approval in the Senate of the last bill which the House passed, which would have still further restricted the manipulators of stocks and bonds throughout the United States. It was all done in the interest of the investors of our Nation. I do not know how much this would cost, but may I say this to the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I do not know whether it is a parliamentary inquiry or not.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I cannot yield just now. There is no parliamentary question that the gentleman can raise.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois refuses to yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. We are entitled to know to whom the gentleman is referring. The gentleman has been talking about the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SABATH. Of course, I meant to say to the gentleman from Michigan. I beg your pardon. There has been so much said about economy from Indiana that I really made a mistake and unfortunately charged the gentleman to Indiana. I know they would be only too pleased if they could have such an able representative as the gentleman from Michigan in their midst. But I would not want to deprive the State of Michigan of their Representative.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for another correction?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. I know that the gentleman is mistaken when he claims to have saved so much of the taxpayers' money when he was chairman of the bondholders' committee. The House saw fit to deny the gentleman and his committee additional funds at that time. Do you recall that?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. CHURCH. That was evidence that the people were through with that program.

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman wishes me to go into that, I will go into it, by the eternal gods, and I will let the real facts be known as to why no more money was appropriated and why the fight was made against appropriating any more money by my colleagues, so that the committee could not delve deeper into the misdeeds of these bondholders' committees, receivers, trustees, trust companies, and bankers who have robbed and continued robbing the American bondholders and investors of billions of dollars—not millions of dollars—but billions of dollars. But I am not going to get personal with the gentleman.

Mr. CHURCH. I just wanted to be sure that the gentleman has the correct picture.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman knows that it was a real investigation and a very good investigation. In his own heart the gentleman knows it was a darn good investigation, honest and fearless. It penetrated deeper into the dark financial morasses than any other committee ever has had the courage to go; so much so, in fact, that you were influenced to do your utmost to restrict, yes, and to stop the investigation, and a Missouri gentleman aided you when the committee would not stop the investigation of a certain clique or gang which, with only $13,000 in cash, had gained control of 42 small life-insurance companies with the purpose of destroying them.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I was hoping that I could conclude in a short time; but, of course, I cannot resist yielding to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], a fellow member of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I have been attempting to follow the statements being made by the gentleman and have been trying to decide in my own mind as to just which committee the gentleman is referring. Is that the committee which the gentleman headed which investigated stock and bond sales and various activities in the stock market?

Mr. SABATH. Not activities in the stock market, but mostly the investigation of bond issues and stocks, life-insurance companies, and, later on, railroads, when the committee was authorized for the third time to go into those questions.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Is that the same committee for which the Garsson brothers were investigators?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I just wanted to identify the committee.

Mr. SABATH. I yielded to my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio, fully expecting that he would, as usual, try to do a little smearing. I could not forbear giving him the pleasure and the opportunity.

May I now say to him, as I have said many times before on this floor, that both these brothers were engaged by the committee of which I had the distinction of being the chairman—the Special Committee To Investigate Bondholders Committees.

Notwithstanding the adverse publicity they have now received, 10 years after they had ended all connection with the committee and with me, I will say to him and to the country again that as investigators they did a mighty good job; a job that few other men would have had the courage, the nerve, and the guts, if you prefer, to do.

But I claim no special credit for their good work. They were not of my choosing. I knew neither of these men until they had been recommended to me by Members from New York. One of those was Judge Culkin, the New York member of the committee, respected and honest. Several other New York Members also recommended them.

I was informed then, as I have repeatedly stated here in this House, that they were not Democrats. They were Republicans. One of them was represented to me as being highly valued by the Republican Secretary of Labor under President Hoover, whose name was, I think, Doaks, and who gave Mr. Garsson a very fine recommendation. After the Secretary's death, Mrs. Doaks remarked on the high esteem and confidence the Secretary had in him.

Before either of these brothers was engaged they were approved by the committee. Actually, the appointments were not mine; I have always preferred to appoint qualified Democrats whenever possible. I repeat, they were good investigators, who brought to light many things which rich and powerful people did not want to be brought into the light. They are still suffering, and we are all still suffering, because of our efforts in behalf of thousands and thousands of small investors who had put their life savings into bonds.

I thank the gentleman. I know that the gentleman wanted to bring that out and I am glad he did.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. That reminds me very much of the old story that it takes a certain type of person to catch a certain other type of person.

Mr. SABATH. That may be true. They were Republicans. They were recommended and approved by the Republican members of the committee and the Republican Members of the State of New York, and I did not know them before at all.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. It was very kind of the gentleman to employ them.

Mr. SABATH. At all times, when I have appointed any individuals to positions within my bestowal, I have tried to follow the recommendations of the Members from the various States, and to the best of my ability to accept their recommendations if the nominees were qualified.

At that time, I did not seek the chairmanship of the investigation, nor the honors and duties and hard work that were mine, but I am proud of the work that was done. Millions and millions of homes were saved and millions upon millions of bondholders' interests were safeguarded. Many of the bonds that were selling then, due to the unfortunate Republican crash, at 3, 5, and 6 cents on the dollar, went up 10, 15, 20, and 50 cents on the dollar as soon as the committee started to investigate, and many were forced to be paid in full.

That was all in the interest of the American people, and especially of the small investors, the estates, the widows, and people who had invested their life savings to provide for themselves in their old age, and on whom these so-called gold bonds were unloaded without sufficient security.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. No; I cannot yield further. I know you gentleman are very liberal and very kind to me; but I cannot yield. If I should, I would be forced to expose and call attention to the underlying reasons the gentleman from Illinois chose to fight against the continuation of the investigation, which I know would be very unpleasant and embarrassing to him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I started to say, I was hopeful, when the Committee on Rules, of which I then had the honor to be chairman, reported the resolution authorizing the reorganization of both Houses, that the law we ultimately passed to that end would bring about economy. But it seems I was mistaken. Instead of bringing about economy, it seems to me, it will ultimately cost the Government much more than heretofore. Surely, we reduced the number of committees. Of course, I have endeavored for years to bring about a reduction of committees which had overlapping jurisdiction by 8 or 10. Under this law, we have reduced the number of committees from 38 to 18, but each and every one of those committees is appointing any number of subcommittees, and the subcommittees desire to have experts and employees. This, notwithstanding that we provided additional help for each committee—giving each committee four experts, I think, at a salary of six, eight, and ten thousand dollars, and six additional employees. I thought, in view of that fact, that no additional employees or experts would be asked for or required. Consequently, as I said before, I congratulate the chairman of the Rules Committee, who has offered the amendment—and I hope it will be adopted—to eliminate the provisions in the resolution, and that the resolution as originally introduced will be passed. I hope this committee will have enough aid to make a thorough investigation of all expenditures in the various departments and in that way bring about economy and greater efficiency. I have no objection to the investigation. I have no objection to the resolution as it has been amended. Indeed, I hope that the committee will bring to light any wrongdoing or any crookedness, and will not merely attempt to smear officials because they are Democrats, especially as the Democrats mostly held only the minor positions, while the major beneficiaries were Republicans. In short, I hope the resolution will pass as amended.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD the text of the decision of Judge Frank A. Picard, of the eastern district of Michigan, with regard to the now famous so-called portal-to-portal pay, notwithstanding the fact that the text may exceed the amount prescribed in the rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

CONTINUING INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 36.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That effective from January 3, 1947, the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, acting as a whole or by subcommittee or subcommittees appointed by the chairman of said committee, is authorized and directed to continue the study, inquiry, and investigation begun under the authority of House Resolution 281 of the Seventy-seventh Congress, and for such purpose shall have the same powers and duties as those conferred upon it by House Resolution 281 of the Seventy-seventh Congress. The committee shall report to the House during the present Congress the results of its studies, inquiries, and investigations, with such recommendations for legislation or otherwise as the committee deems desirable.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 36 enables the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to continue its investigation to determine whether the programs of the United States Maritime Commission are being executed efficiently, expeditiously, and economically. These investigatory powers were first granted to the committee by House Resolution 281 of the Seventy-seventh Congress and subsequently continued by action of the Seventy-eighth and Seventy-ninth Congresses.

During hearings before the Rules Committee on this resolution, it was brought out that the General Accounting Office made forced adjustments of more than $8,000,000,000 in balancing accounts for expenditures of $21,000,000,000 by the Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration. It has been estimated that 200 accountants would require 6 months to put the Maritime Commission's books in order for an audit. Although the Merchant Marine Committee's chairman emphasized that he wishes no witch hunt, he points out the taxpayers deserve an accurate accounting, and I agree with him.

It is probably too late to recover any money that might have been improperly expended, but continuation of the investigatory powers of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, as proposed by this resolution, would provide constant and continuing congressional surveillance of the present and future activities, policies, and expenditures of the Maritime Commission, and might prevent a recurrence of that agency's lax accounting methods, which are a perfect cover-up for criminal fraud.

Having been charged by the Congress with disposition of surplus war-built ships, valued at billions of dollars, the Maritime Commission is responsible for the largest individual surplus-property disposal program of any Government agency. Congress must maintain a constant check to prevent abuses, and correct those that might arise in transactions involving so huge a sum.

In the past, investigations by the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee have paid for themselves a thousandfold. Its investigations netted the United States Treasury about forty millions of dollars last year alone, by requiring payment of what might have otherwise been charged off as bad debts.

By now it should be obvious to all of us that Congress is the only safeguard against the waste, corruption, and fraud which rises inevitably with bureaucracy. The difficulty of fixing responsibility for malfeasance in such a labyrinth of redundant Government functions is an invitation to unscrupulous Federal officials to commit fraud. It is a sad admission that administration of our Government has degenerated to such a state. Talking, however, will not remedy the situation. We must have legislation. When he appeared before the Committee on Rules, the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries promised legislation to remedy any abuses existing in the United States Maritime Commission. I, therefore, recommend the adoption of this resolution.

Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to use any time?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, as has been stated, this resolution provides for an extension of powers which were originally given to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries 5 years ago.

This committee in my opinion has done a fairly good job but they have not completed their entire investigation. I believe they should have additional power and additional time. Many charges have been made as to the squandering of large funds on the part of the War Shipping Administration. Many of the older Members, of course, will remember that for several years I have called attention to the fact that the War Department, the Navy Department, and the Maritime Commission have been reckless in their expenditures, and from time to time I demanded investigations. I hope a real investigation will now be made as to all of these unjustifiable, unwarranted, and reckless expenditures especially on the part of these three agencies. I feel that such investigation should be made so that the country may know the real war profiteers, the officers and officials who were responsible for the reckless use of taxpayers' moneys and the mulcting of millions, yes billions, of dollars of Government funds.

Mr. Speaker, I am therefore in favor of the adoption of this resolution and any other resolution that will result in the thorough investigation of waste and reckless expenditures on the part of Government agencies and departments.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GRANGER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a memorial passed by the Utah State Legislature.

Mr. HAVENNER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a letter from a constituent.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—RUBBER CONTROLS (H. DOC. 111)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In my recent message to the Congress requesting the extension of certain titles of the Second War Powers Act for continued controls in a few specific areas, I pointed out the importance of natural and synthetic rubber to the national security. In that connection I urged the Congress to continue allocation controls over rubber pending consideration of permanent legislation that would insure the maintenance of a minimum synthetic rubber industry in the United States.

I am sure that the Congress will wish to consider carefully all aspects of the problem before enacting permanent legislation. During the period of such consideration, however, I urge that there be no break in the continuity of policy and administrative action concerning both natural and synthetic rubber. I, therefore, wish to review, in somewhat fuller detail than was possible in my previous message, the character of this problem, and to suggest actions that seem desirable for the Congress to take at this time.

The problem has not been a matter of immediate concern up to the present time, because world supplies of natural rubber have been so critically short that it has been necessary for us to make fullest practicable use of our facilities for producing synthetic rubber. As I stated in my previous message, the world supply of natural rubber is still inadequate to meet world needs. We must, however, recognize that the time is rapidly approaching when this condition will no longer prevail. According to the best evidence that I have been able to obtain, it appears that perhaps in late 1947, and almost certainly by early 1948, natural rubber production will have increased to the point where it will be possible to satisfy world rubber needs largely from natural rubber. With an adequate world supply of natural rubber and a free choice of materials by industry, the use of synthetic rubber in the United States might fall substantially below the permanent production goals considered to be minimum for the needs of national security. This would be even more likely if at some time in 1948 the world supply of natural rubber should begin to exceed the total world demand for all rubber.

The Congress has already made provision, by means of the Strategic and Critical Materials Stock Piling Act of 1946, for the accumulation of a stock pile of natural rubber within the borders of the United States. The physical properties of rubber, however, and the necessity of stock-pile rotation, place limits which make the largest feasible Government stock pile of natural rubber inadequate in itself to meet the demands of a national emergency. The stock pile must be supplemented by an assured production of American-made rubber.

Appropriate action should be taken now to assure that adequate facilities for the production of American-made rubber of the highest quality continue to be available. Part of this productive capacity should continue in effective operation, and the techniques required for the efficient processing of synthetic rubber in the manufacture of rubber products should be maintained and improved.

The Congress will recall the extraordinary measures that had to be taken in the early days of the recent war to meet the emergency caused by the sudden unavailability of our normal supplies of rubber. At the direction of President Roosevelt a Rubber Survey Committee was created which outlined vigorous measures to be taken by both industry and Government. We were fortunate in having time to carry out the program outlined by this Committee, for the shortage of rubber could have caused the collapse of our war effort and of our domestic economy.

On another occasion we might not be so fortunate. The security of the United States and the essential needs of its citizens must never again be jeopardized by inadequate or uncertain rubber supplies.

In recognition of this fact, the Director of War Mobilization and Reconversion created an Interagency Policy Committee on Rubber in September 1945. This Committee made an exhaustive study of the problem, in cooperation with industry and the executive agencies concerned, and submitted two reports which were transmitted to the Congress on March 8 and July 22, 1946. These reports outline the dimensions of the problem and suggest various methods of meeting it.

The Congress should deal with all aspects of this matter during the present session because of its vital effect upon our national security. Meanwhile, it is imperative that the Congress extend authority to continue controls over rubber under the Second War Powers Act, as I requested in my previous message. Prompt action by the Congress will provide the basis for continuity of operation in rubber controls, and will permit their simplification and orderly relaxation or removal. It will also greatly aid the agencies concerned in planning production in Government-owned synthetic rubber plants and such action will contribute to the disposal of these plants to private industry.

The time will soon arrive when it will no longer be necessary to use these controls to insure equitable distribution of natural rubber or to produce the maximum number of commodities from synthetic rubber. When this time comes, continued controls would be used only for the purpose of insuring the maintenance of a minimum synthetic rubber industry in the United States. Controls should be used for such maintenance of a synthetic rubber industry only if specific authority is provided for that purpose.

I therefore recommend that the Senate and the House of Representatives, by joint resolution, make a declaration of policy to the effect that it is the firm intention of the Government to maintain a synthetic rubber industry in the United States, adequate to the minimum needs of national security.

I further recommend that the Senate and the House of Representatives act expeditiously in establishing appropriate committee arrangements to consider the problems involved in maintaining a synthetic rubber industry in the United States and to draft such legislation as is found to be necessary to accomplish this objective.

I repeat my recent recommendation that the authority to continue allocation controls on rubber be continued for 1 year under title III of the Second War Powers Act, in order that the Congress may have an opportunity to consider this problem and to enact such permanent legislation as in its judgment is necessary and appropriate.

The program of action I have outlined has the unanimous and vigorous support of all agencies of Government concerned with this problem. I am instructing these agencies to give all possible assistance to the Congress in its consideration of the problem, and to make available, on request, the statistical material and other information which they have collected.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 7, 1947.

PROTECTING AMERICAN AGRICULTURE, HORTICULTURE, LIVESTOCK, AND THE PUBLIC HEALTH

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill H. R. 597.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain the bill?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, this bill will provide legislation which makes mandatory the proper handling of garbage from transportation facilities, such as ships, railway cars, airplanes, and other forms of transportation by which garbage might be carried. Last year I introduced a similar bill, which passed the House but on account of a typographical error found on the last day of the session in the Senate the bill was held up. I reintroduced this bill in January of this year.

We now have in Mexico the hoof-and-mouth disease, and this bill will go a long way to protect what I believe might be one of the main germ carriers, transportation. Back in 1924 and 1925 we had the hoof-and-mouth disease in the United States. At that time it was brought in by ships from foreign countries. Garbage was dumped in the waters on the west coast near San Francisco, and we lost thousands of head of cattle. We have the disease now in Mexico, and we all know that public carriers are daily coming from Mexico into the United States without proper regulation as to garbage that might be dumped in the United States and bring about this infection and disease. This bill will protect the American horticulture, agriculture, and livestock industry. I would like to see the House adopt this bill, because I think it is urgently needed, particularly at this time. Mexico, our neighboring country, has perhaps as much as half a million head of livestock affected by the hoof-and-mouth disease.

Mr. HOPE. While I made a reservation of objection, I have no intention, of course, of objecting to the bill. It is true, as the gentleman has stated, that the bill passed the House unanimously, as I recall it, in the last session, and it lacked passage only because of a clerical error which resulted in the consideration of the bill being postponed in the Senate. The Committee on Agriculture the other day reported the bill unanimously. I know of no objection to it.

Mr. ELLIOTT. It is important to bring it up at this time because of the prevalence of the hoof-and-mouth disease in Mexico, and I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the measure at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) for the purposes of this act—

(1) The term "garbage" means waste material, such as food scraps, table refuse, galley refuse, and refuse from stores of ships, railway cars, and aircraft, including such waste material in passengers' and crews' quarters, derived, in whole or in part, from fruits, vegetables, or animal products which have originated outside of, and have not previously legally entered, the continental United States.

(2) The term "fruits, vegetables, or animal products" shall not include fruits, vegetables, or animal products, purchased as ships' provisions in Canadian ports on the Great Lakes, unless there is in effect, with respect thereto, a proclamation issued under subsection (b) of this section.

(3) The term "vessel" means every description of craft or other contrivance used, or capable of being used, as means of transportation on or in water.

(4) The term "aircraft" means every description of craft or other contrivance used, or capable of being used, as means of transportation through the air.

(5) The term "person" means an individual, partnership, corporation, company, society, or association, a State or any agency thereof, or a political subdivision of a State or any agency thereof; and such term imports the singular or plural, as the case may be.

(6) The term "United States," when not limited by the adjective "continental," includes all Territories and possessions of the United States, with the exception of the Philippine Islands and the Canal Zone.

(7) The term "continental United States" means that part of the United States located on the continent of North America, including Alaska, but excluding Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and the Canal Zone.

(8) The term "territorial waters of the United States" means all navigable waters of the United States, including all portions of the sea within its jurisdiction.

(9) The term "land" means not only that part of the earth's surface usually connoted by that term, but includes any building, platform, or other structure affixed to the land, whether permanent or temporary, and any pier, dock, wharf, or bridge extending into or across territorial waters of the United States.

(10) The term "authorized representative of the United States" means any employee of the United States Department of Agriculture, any customs, immigration, or public-health officer of the United States, and any commissioned, warrant or petty officer of the United States Coast Guard, authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of this act.

(11) The term "authorized garbage collector" means any person holding an unsuspended and unrevoked authorization from the Secretary of Agriculture to collect garbage from vessels, railway cars, aircraft, and other vehicles arriving in the United States.

(b) Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture finds that any type or kind of fruit, vegetable, or animal product, purchased as ships' provisions at Canadian ports, is likely to be a source of contagious disease dangerous to humans or animals, he shall issue a proclamation to that effect; and, whenever, after issuing any such proclamation the Secretary finds that such type or kind of fruit, vegetable, or animal product, so purchased, is no longer likely to be a source of contagious disease dangerous to humans or animals he shall by order revoke such proclamation.

SEC. 2. For the purpose of protecting American agriculture, horticulture, livestock, and the public health, the following acts are hereby prohibited and made unlawful:

(a) Throwing, discharging, or depositing garbage, or causing, suffering, or procuring garbage to be thrown, discharged, or deposited, from any vessel, railway car, aircraft, or other vehicle into any territorial waters of the United States unless such garbage has been reduced to fluid form.

(b) Throwing, discharging, carrying, or depositing garbage, or causing, suffering, or procuring garbage to be thrown, discharged, carried, or deposited, from any vessel, railway car, aircraft, or other vehicle onto land within the United States: Provided, however, That garbage may be so carried and deposited in tightly closed containers, for immediate incineration or for delivery to an authorized garbage collector, if arrangements have been made with said collector immediately to receive the same, or it may be otherwise safeguarded in a manner satisfactory to the authorized representative of the United States.

(c) The retention or maintenance of garbage on vessels, railway cars, aircraft, or other vehicles within the United States except in tightly closed containers and under such treatment as may be prescribed by an authorized representative of the United States.

SEC. 3 The presence in a vessel, railway car, aircraft, or other vehicle, for consumption therein, of animal products not permitted entry under the sanitary laws of the United States, or of fresh fruits or vegetables which have originated outside of the continental United States shall constitute prima facie evidence that garbage which has accumulated in the vessel, railway car, aircraft, or other vehicle has been derived, in whole or in part, from such animal products, fruits, or vegetables, and, for the purpose of ascertaining whether any such animal products, fruits, or vegetables are being transported in any vessel, railway car, aircraft, or other vehicle arriving in the United States, any authorized representative of the United States shall have power, without warrant, to inspect any such vessel, railway car, aircraft, or other vehicle.

SEC. 4. No customs entry need be filed nor duty paid with respect to any garbage disposed of in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] is recognized for 20 minutes.

GOVERNMENT PROPAGANDA ACTIVITIES

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, during the campaign last November I repeatedly urged the residents of my district to vote on the basis of facts rather than rumors or propaganda. I believe I made that suggestion in every campaign speech. I further promised that if elected to Congress I would try to keep my district informed as to the activities of their Government.

It was with this in view that I introduced a few days ago a resolution authorizing a special committee to investigate Government public relations and propaganda activities.

So far as I can learn Congress has never in contemporary times obtained an integrated over-all picture of what we are spending on publicity agents and just what those agents do. Various appropriations subcommittees get some of these facts piecemeal as they consider the respective supply bills. But no committee so far as I can ascertain has ever compiled this information in such form that a House Member can learn for himself the costs and functions of Government publicity and propaganda. I feel that some House committee should collect these facts, that thereafter Congress should determine a definite policy with respect to publicity, and that appropriations should be confirmed by this policy.

Let me make it abundantly plain that I am not attacking the theory that Government needs information specialists to help the radio and press get the facts. Nor am I criticizing press and radio for utilizing such services. Beyond any doubt there is a need in Washington for a limited number of such information specialists.

Newspapermen here inform me that some of these press agents right now are performing a number of valuable services. For instance, I am told that public-relations men at the Labor and Interior Departments have evoked an open-door policy. In other words, they encourage Washington correspondents to make inquiries and they help the correspondents to get in touch with the proper officials. That undeniably is a helpful public service.

The press officer at the Justice Department, on the other hand, seems to function more or less as a censor or security officer. I am told by newspapermen that they must channel their inquiries at the Justice Department through the public information director. He in turn releases only such information as he or his superiors may choose. I am sure Congress does not regard that type of public information as desirable.

The State Department is now operating a vast foreign publicity program through its Office of International Information and Cultural Affairs. That office now has more than 3,000 employees. I am told that in many cases the Department has taken on young men just out of military service with little or no experience in public relations and little or no actual first-hand knowledge of American social and economic institutions. Yet these young men are being hired at salaries ranging from $6,000 to $7,000 and are being sent all over the world to serve as publicity agents for the United States Government. I am told that these agents are being appointed by the State Department without any examination whatsoever, and are being assured that after some service abroad they will be given a permanent State Department status without qualifying by examinations.

I have here an example of how this organization spends the taxpayers' hard-earned dollars. Look magazine recently published reprints of seven paintings purchased by the Government, we are told at a cost of $40,000. These paintings are to be sent around the world as an exhibition of American art and culture. If these paintings represent American art at its best, let us bury them in a deep hole instead of displaying them to our neighbors.

The Federal Reserve Board presents another example of what I regard as a bad practice. It has long been the habit of many Federal agencies to hire publicity agents in the guise of other capacities. Thus their budget allocations are not identified as being for the purpose of public information. At the Federal Reserve Board, for instance, a Mr. Elliott Thurston is listed in the Official Register of the United States as "Assistant to the Chairman." Now as a matter of fact, Mr. Thurston is a former Washington correspondent who is actually public information director for the Board. This is well known by newspapermen here who contact the Board for information. Yet, officially Mr. Thurston has nothing to do with public relations, but is listed as an assistant to the Chairman.

It is my understanding that Mr. Thurston is the highest paid Government public-relations man in Washington.

The Official Register of the United States does not list his salary, but discloses that his salary is paid from assessments levied by the Board upon Federal Reserve banks.

Such disbursements by the banks naturally increase the cost of service to bank patrons. I feel sure that the public and the banks would welcome some revelation by Congress concerning Mr. Thurston's position and duties.

Any Member of the House can get some idea of what this overgrown Federal publicity system is costing the taxpayers by glancing at the 1947 budget requests for the Office of the Secretary of Commerce. Under this office are listed the following publicity agents:

Director of Publications, $10,000 a year salary.

Assistant Director of Publications, $8,479 a year.

Chief, Editorial Section, $8,180 a year.

Chief, Publications Program, $8,180 a year.

Chief of the Field Publications Service, $7,342.

Five information specialists, $29,525.

Four city editors, $23,860.

One information specialist, $4,902.

Head of the Publications Section, $4,902.

Now bear in mind that these press agents are only those found in the office of the Secretary of Commerce. Many of the agencies in the Department have their own public information specialists listed separately.

These figures do not include the salaries of those who grind out the material released.

Just to give the Members of the House some idea of the hand-outs prepared and distributed daily by Government public information men I asked one of the newspapermen to save for me such handouts or press releases received by his office in 1 day. Here they are. You can see they make up a pile about 2 inches thick. Any Member is perfectly welcome to look these over if he wishes.

Here is another phase of Government handouts which I think the House should look into. I hold in my hand a rather beautiful and comprehensive document printed in the Government Printing Office and compiled by the War Assets Administration. It numbers 16 pages printed on very high-grade glossy stock. It is well filled with excellent and costly art.

It is pure undiluted propaganda. There is not one single word of news in it that would be regarded as legitimate copy by a good newspaper or magazine. Its real purpose is to convince Congress and the public that the War Assets Administration has been making a valuable contribution to the Nation by selling war surpluses.

That sort of thing should be stopped.

Here is another example of Government publicity which I think should be given attention by this House. It is laughable, but it is costly.

This is an official Department of Commerce press release setting forth the conclusions of specialists in that Department who studied the establishment and operation of a book store. Here is their conclusion as set forth in this official release. I quote:

> It is more important to be a smart businessman than a bookworm if you are to make a success of running a book store.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a Commerce Department press release edited and broadcast at the taxpayers' expense.

I have here a hand-out which the Veterans' Administration probably will maintain is valuable and indispensable. It is entitled "Fillers." It presents three pages of short two- or three-line paragraphs which the administration hopes newspapers will use to fill in surplus white space. I find it difficult to regard this sort of activity as essential to the press of the Nation.

I hold in my hand the Consumers' Guide, a Department of Agriculture publication printed on good glossy paper with plenty of pictures. How many magazines of this kind do you suppose the Government publishes? I would like to know. We employ thousands of people to furnish material to private publishers. Then we compete with them by publishing and distributing free magazines.

I have here a few press releases for February 8 and 9. These releases used to be sent out on plain inexpensive paper, but now I suppose that we are in the money with a thirty-five billion dollar tax income and the shooting war over. Now we must have colored letterheads. In fact, the Public Relations Division of the War Department now put their releases out with two-color jobs—the old red, white, and blue.

Again, I want to emphasize my object is to obtain the definite facts for Congress. Talk to any Washington newspaperman or radio man and you will get all sorts of reactions and reports on Government public information operations. Nobody seems to know what the program is or is intended to be. I feel the time has come for Congress to lay down a definite policy for Government publicity.

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I yield.

Mr. VURSELL. I presume a lot of this excessive and useless mail comes under what is called penalty mail in the Post Office Department.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. It certainly is. There is no postage on any of it.

Mr. VURSELL. Being a member of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, I find that in 1946 that Department stacked up a deficit of something like $300,000,000. The President has called attention to this deficit and has recommended higher postal rates. Of that deficit probably fifty or seventy-five million is on account of the unnecessary and useless mail issued by the various Federal departments, known as penalty mail. I do not know what can be done about it, but I think the gentleman should be commended for bringing this to the attention of the House. Certainly one way to stop this would be to blast out some of this bureaucracy, and put these people, who have nothing to do except to waste Government money, back into civilian life where they might produce something to support the Government, rather than to ride and let their feet drag all the time at the expense of the Government.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. That is exactly what I am trying to do. We have to find out where these people are and under what title we will find them on the pay roll. They will not be down there as publicity experts in many, many cases.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BISHOP). Under the previous order of the House the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES] is recognized for 30 minutes.

TAX REDUCTION

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, ever since this Congress convened the first part of January, we have heard a considerable amount of talk about reducing taxes. I do not believe there is any Member of this House or of the Senate either who would not and does not hope that he can with good conscience vote for a reduction in taxes. This, of course, is a most laudable objective, but I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether we have spent enough time talking about how we can accomplish this objective. We spend too much time, I think, talking about formulas and overlooking the most important point: That we can reduce taxes only as we correspondingly reduce expenditures. Mr. Speaker, we must do two very definite things before we can reach the point where we discuss and talk formulas for tax reduction, in my opinion. In the first place, we must balance the budget. We cannot spend the same amount we have been spending in the past and still balance our budget. In order, therefore, to accomplish even the first objective we have got to start cutting, and cutting deep. It amuses me very much, Mr. Speaker, to find gentlemen from the other side of the aisle here entering into the discussion of tax reduction and tax formulas when they themselves are committed to a Presidential budget which under no stretch of the imagination can leave room for any tax reduction. So I believe it would come with much better grace for them to stop talking about formulas for reducing taxes and to start whittling away at their own Presidential and party budget.

Before we talk about tax reductions we must, I believe, make provision for a very substantial payment on the national debt, and we cannot do even that if we are going to accept the Presidential budget of $37,500,000,000. So that I believe the other side of the House might well give consideration to this factor before they inject themselves into the tax-reduction program. When we do this, when we make provision for the balancing of the budget, and when we make provision, Mr. Speaker, for a substantial payment on the national debt, then is the time for making some cut in taxes.

Mr. Speaker, I am not saying that these three objectives are impossible, that they cannot be achieved; in fact, Mr. Speaker, I very firmly believe that under the new controls in the House and in the Senate and under the new philosophy that should pervade as a result of that change that all three of these objectives can and will be accomplished. But I want to warn the House and I want to warn the American public that those objectives cannot be accomplished and will not be accomplished unless there is a deep-seated desire and a will to actually cut expenditures to the bone. Mr. Speaker, that is what we should concentrate on today. That is what our objective should be. The objectives, as far as the end results are concerned, namely, balancing the budget, making a substantial payment on the national debt, and cutting taxes, are very laudable, and, as I say, I believe they can be accomplished; but, as in the war period, we had an ultimate objective, namely, the winning of the war. Where did we concentrate? We concentrated on a plan of operation as to how to attain that ultimate objective. That is what we have got to do today. We have to draw up a plan of operation in order to cut expenditures so as to make those things possible. This plan of operation, Mr. Speaker, should be to eliminate at least a minimum of $7,500,000,000 from the Presidential budget. We have got to spend more time talking, thinking, acting, and doing something about that. Then we can attain our ultimate objective of cutting taxes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman will agree that everything depends upon how high or how low a ceiling we place on the budget. We will have to start from there.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. The gentleman is absolutely correct, but I think he has to carry that one step further. Your budget top does not mean anything unless you are going to stick to it, stay with it, and insist on it.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman will recall that in the reorganization law it is provided that if the Congress exceeds the ceiling fixed on the budget we will have to amend the War Debt Act to increase the ceiling on the war debt?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. The gentleman is correct, but there is always that loophole. That is what I am worrying about, and I say that every Member of the House and every citizen of this country should worry about that. They should not forget that you cannot give a dollar in tax reduction until you take that dollar off your expenditures. That is where we have to concentrate.

Mr. KNUTSON. The great danger to the program, as I see it, is that too many Members may listen to false prophets.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I think the gentleman is very right in that statement. The reason I think it is necessary to take the floor at this time to try in my little voice to emphasize this necessity for reduction of expenditures is the fact that we have still prevailing in the Congress, in the House of Representatives at least, the theory that we can keep on going and spending on new things or more things, continuing on and still be able to accomplish the three objectives which I have mentioned. I think it is a sad commentary to read an article in the January 31 issue of the United States News. It is a very factual statement, and I want to call it to the attention of the House. Here is what the article states:

> The "gimme" theme still dominates, even in this period of roaring prosperity. Veterans want more billions when already they are receiving $7,000,000,000 a year. Farmers want Government to do more for them, in new price supports, production bonuses, and guaranteed high income. States want the National Treasury to help out with support of their schools. Old people want bigger pensions, bigger subsidies for State pension systems. Then there are costly aviation-development plans, more loans to business, more money asked for subsidies.

I continue further:

> The demand for more money, for bigger spending, is bipartisan, and shows a tendency to grow and not decline with the size of existing payments.

Further on and more or less in conclusion of this article appears the following statement:

> All in all, except for bills calling for investigations of past Democratic administration and for regulation of labor unions, the mass of bills in Congress reflects an apparently deep desire on the part of the American people to get something for nothing. Members of Congress propose a very great range of ideas for pumping dollars out of the United States Treasury and into the pockets of one group or another. At the same time, there is a strong desire to reduce taxes and to lower the national debt. No Member of Congress, however, is offering a formula by which hand-outs and subsidies can be stepped up by additional billions of dollars a year while taxes are being reduced and debt retired.

Yes; we talk on one hand of spending more money and we talk on the other hand of reducing taxes, but the formula is not presented to show how you can possibly do that. It just cannot be done. You have to cut first and then your taxes can be cut, and you cannot increase your expenditures without increasing your taxes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman would not attempt to handicap the rural electrification program, would he, since that money all comes back? It is merely a loan to the farmers to build their own lines, and comes back with interest.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I am not talking about any specific cut in that connection, but I do say this, that we have got to adopt an attitude that if definite economies can at the present time be made in rural electrification, they must be made, in spite of our individual desire to see a greater expansion made. That is true of all programs, and there is one place, Mr. Speaker, I think, where we are running into difficulty. We are inclined to take the attitude that it is all well and good to cut the other fellow, but "do not cut me," and that is a philosophy that we cannot let continue if there is going to be any cutting at all.

There are several specific things that I think this Government must do, and I would like to just point them out. In the first place, we must shut our eyes and our ears against new proposals for expenditures. We have got to make up our minds that we are going to resist all pressures for increases in Federal expenditures, for new aids to groups or to States or to local units of government; that for the time being, at least until we get our financial house in order, we must close the door to new expenditures.

No. 2. We must cut drastically our present proposed expenditures, and this has to be done in two places: First, in the operation even of necessary governmental activities, and then, second, we must cut out a lot of activities that are not in and of themselves absolutely essential or that cannot be performed by other units of Government.

Let us look for a moment at necessary governmental activities. We know that there is needless and top-heavy personnel and overlapping expenditures, and those must be investigated thoroughly. I know that the various subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations are working hard in examining under a microscope these various departments and other activities to cut out this deadwood and overlapping. They must jump on the necks of every department or employee that spends one needless dollar. Then, Mr. Speaker, we have got to back those subcommittees up because it will not do any good for them to come in with a proposal for a cut and a proposal for economies in departmental activities if the House itself is going to overrule them and say, "No; we have got to keep this or that appropriation up." We have got to stand by the subcommittees of our Committee on Appropriations when they make their cuts.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin, who has made a very careful study of this question, will agree that it is necessary to keep the Federal spending at $32,000,000,000 or less if we are to have any tax reduction.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. In fact, I believe we should have a minimum cut of $7,500,000,000, which would bring the budget down to $30,000,000,000.

Mr. KNUTSON. Of course, there are those who claim that the budget can be cut down to $28,000,000,000; I do not know. But I am satisfied it can be brought down to $32,000,000,000 without in any way impairing the national defense, our obligation to the veterans, and for all needed expenditures for necessary Government activities.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. The gentleman is absolutely right. If we have the determination to do it, and the will do it, and I sincerely hope we have, the cuts can be made. But, we must become a little more worried as to whether or not we are going to reach that objective. We must keep it constantly in our minds.

Mr. KNUTSON. I think the gentleman's fears are well founded because we detect on both sides of the aisle that spreading disease that calls for spending and spending, and taxing and taxing.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. The gentleman is right. There are bills proposed in this House every day. I wish an analysis of them could be made. But there are bills and resolutions introduced in this House every day for spending more money to start some new project. Now, you cannot do that on one hand, and on the other hand say, "We are going to balance the budget, and make a payment on the national debt, and cut taxes." Those things just do not go together.

Mr. KNUTSON. As I recall, there were introduced in the Seventy-ninth Congress bills calling for authorizations in excess of $36,000,000,000 for extraneous activities.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I will bet that you have come very close to that already this year on new projects.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. THOMASON. I am sure that the gentleman does not intend to leave the impression that these bills to spend a great deal of money are introduced only from one side of the aisle.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I have not said that.

Mr. KNUTSON. I have not said that either.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I admit that there are Members on my side of the aisle sponsoring such legislation and I do not like to see that. I am lecturing to them right now as much as I am lecturing anybody on either side of the aisle, that is, if it is within my province to lecture anybody, which I doubt, but they are on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KNUTSON. May I say to the gentleman from Texas that no individual is completely immune to the "gimmies." We have not yet found the serum to cure it, but I think one more election will pretty nearly eradicate it.

Mr. THOMASON. I just wanted to be sure that the RECORD did not show that all these bills calling for the expenditure of untold millions and even billions of dollars come from the Democratic side only because I know that many, many bills are introduced by Republican Members of the House asking for untold sums of money in the way of public expenditures.

Mr. KNUTSON. That just goes to show you how a bad example will infect even this side of the House.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I can appreciate how the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle may be sensitive when we start criticizing new expenditures, because there certainly is no question but what the Congress and the American people were educated by his side of the aisle to look to the Federal Government for hand-out after hand-out. That is the biggest difficulty that the Republican majority will have to overcome. They will have to reeducate the people that the Federal Government is not the great provider and that the people have on some occasions to look after themselves and that local units of government should do something themselves and that the Federal Government is not the first place and the last place to go for every dime, nickel, and million dollars that is spent.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. THOMASON. There was some discussion on the floor earlier in the day about a resolution sent here from the legislature, I believe, of the State of Indiana.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I was going to discuss that if the gentleman will permit me to proceed.

Mr. THOMASON. I hope the gentleman will in the able speech that he is making discuss the question whether his colleagues are going to vote for or against Federal appropriations, not only for Federal highways but also for soil conservation and rural electrification.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. If I may proceed, I am going to cover that point.

But let me get back to this culling of the operations of our necessary governmental expenditures to date. We have to cut them right down to the bone and see that there is not one dollar wasted. This may probably be considered a very petty example of some of the expenses that are incurred by these departments which are absolutely wasted money. I was pleased to hear the gentleman from Connecticut, who preceded me, call the attention of the House to the waste resulting from propaganda that is put out by the departments. Here is another small waste that struck me, as the bobby-soxers would say, as "being out of this world." It was sent to me by a hardware wholesaler and distributor in my district. It is a notice sent out by the Navy Department of a sale of some surplus goods that the Navy Department has. This is a full-page letter with references to the particular procedure, and so forth, which is to be followed in selling these items to the public and opening up the bids. Naturally, this letter had to be prepared by at least a lieutenant in the Navy. It had to be signed by a captain and had to go through a mimeograph machine, and it had to be sent out in the mail. Then, under the procedure, it was to come back and the bids opened and all the rest of the procedure followed. I leave it to your own imagination to guess how much it cost to get out this particular notice of this particular sale. What are they selling? What are they trying to sell? Her it is:

Item No. 1, quantity three wastebaskets, used, good condition.

Item No. 2, quantity two costumers, gray steel, used, good condition.

Item No. 3, quantity, three cuspidors, used, good condition.

That is the extent of the entire sale. The person who sent me this is in the business of handling material like that, and he said he doubts if anybody, under any circumstances, would want to pay more than a dollar for the complete outfit.

Mr. KNUTSON. Are there any chamber appurtenances mentioned there?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. That is the extent of it. If you are going to have extravagance in little things, you are bound to expect them in the bigger things. We have got to cut right down to the bottom.

I would like to be able to check the long-distance telephone bills of these departments. They will wait for a month or two months before they take action on something, but when they finally do then everything hurries up, and they put in a ten- or fifteen-dollar long-distance telephone call. I do not mind how much money the departments spend if they do an efficient job and the expenditure is necessary. I do not believe in cutting out the absolute necessities. I certainly believe in doing what you have got to do in as economical and efficient a way as possible. This Navy Department deal is not one of them.

Second, Mr. Speaker, other than the present necessity for scrutinizing most carefully these departments and their activities, we should take a long-range view, and I think early consideration should be given to H. R. 775, introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], which would appoint a nonpartisan commission to study the executive departments with the idea of promoting economy and efficiency and improving the service and transaction of public business in the various departments, agencies, and bureaus.

That, Mr. Speaker, would be a long-range view for the purpose of at least working constantly in the direction of getting some kind of efficiency and economy.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Why impose on the Government another commission? That is what the Members of Congress are here for. Why attempt to delegate that prerogative to an additional commission? They would probably come in and recommend three more commissions.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I suggest that the gentleman read H. R. 775. I do not think he will find it is the general type of commission that we generally find when we set up another bureau or another agency.

Mr. RANKIN. They "think of six and sing seven." I have been watching the creation of these commissions for many years. Instead of cutting down commissions they multiply commissions. That is what the Members of the Congress are here for. It is our duty to make these investigations. We ought not to create another commission. We are commissioned to death now.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I disagree with the gentleman on that score as far as somebody to investigate and bring out an adequate plan for the reorganization of these executive agencies, culling them out and cutting out the overlapping that presently exists, needs a thorough expert examination. I must definitely disagree with my friend from Mississippi on that score.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Does the gentleman recommend any saving on the appropriation that was made during the last Congress for the British loan if Great Britain continues to violate it, as has been reported by the Secretary of the Treasury recently? There is still $1,000,000 of that unused. We might save some of it.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I appreciate what the gentleman is driving at. I am inclined to take the position that having committed ourselves there we must go through with it. I do not believe in going back on the word of the American people. I voted against the British loan. I was not for it in the beginning. But the commitment has been made. Let us confine ourselves to cleaning our house. The cleaning must be done. We must do the things that we know we can do. We can do them in honesty and in good faith. We must do it to keep faith with the American people. It is my belief that the whole scope of Federal activities, in view of the tremendous growth of the National Government in the past 15 years, must be reexamined for the elimination of needless activities and the transfer of the responsibility for certain activities to the smaller units of government.

In relation to the State and local units of government, the Federal Government from a fiscal standpoint exhibits a pattern of spectacular growth in the past 15 years. I would just like to have the membership look at the increase in Federal expenditures during the past years, say from 1913 on to the present time.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD a table showing the expenditures of Federal, State, and local governments from the fiscal years 1913 to 1947.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BISHOP). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The last Congress, supported by the Members on both sides of the aisle, authorized the expenditure of large sums of money for river and harbor improvements, flood-control projects, and so forth.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. If the gentleman is going to go into specific and individual projects now, I said they should all be examined. I am going to go into that. They should all be examined from the standpoint of whether these can be done by the local communities, by the local unit. Or is it absolutely necessary that it be done by the Federal Government? If it is necessary that it be done by the Federal Government and that is the best and the most economical way to do it I will be for its continuation; but there are plenty of them, and the gentleman should know it, plenty of Federal expenditures for projects that can be better done by local units.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Since the projects have been authorized by the Congress by votes on both sides of the aisle, does the gentleman believe that the Federal Government should go on and appropriate the money to start them and finish them, or does he believe they should be looked into again or reexamined?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I think they should be looked into again; I very definitely do. If the gentleman will go through the books he will find authorizations for appropriations for public buildings and rivers and harbors projects, and other expenditures that would take all our revenue for the next 15 years or more if we appropriated for all of them authorized now. I think they should be reexamined, absolutely, because we have got to cull out everything that possibly can be culled out.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include at this point a table showing the percentage distribution of governmental expenditures between the Federal, State, and local governments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

From Facts and Figures on Government Finance, 1946–47, Tax Foundation, New York, N. Y.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I call the attention of the House to this table. This does not involve the amount of money, it is the percentage distribution, we know the amount has increased but the thing that is interesting and important about this table is that it shows who is spending the tax dollar.

It shows the tragic shift from local expenditures and administration to Federal expenditure and administration.

It can readily be seen from these tables that of late years, especially during the last 15 years, there has been a pronounced shift in governmental expenditures and in tax collections. I think it is important to note that since 1932, excluding the war years, the Federal Government has not only tremendously increased its expenditures, but it has taken the place of local governments as the greatest governmental spender and has taken the place of the local government as the greatest governmental tax collector. These facts cannot be overlooked in any discussion of economy in the Federal Government.

I believe there is one big question facing the Congress and the American people, namely, has not the centralized Federal Government, with all the evils inherent in big government, assumed responsibilities, expenditures, and tax privileges that might better be placed in the hands of the State and local units, and in doing so placed itself in a most dangerous fiscal position. I believe that if we will analyze this question and the answer to it, we will find at least one important step that can be taken in the direction of putting our fiscal house in order.

Let me discuss just one aspect of this question, aids to States. I wonder how many Members appreciate how steadily and spectacularly the increase in aid to States, not including payments to individuals within the States, has been since 1930. In 1930 the total Federal aid to States was $109,000,000. This has steadily increased so that in 1945 the total amount had risen to $849,000,000. The following table shows this increase:

Federal aid to States, by purpose, selected fiscal years

Just look at 1 year's total of the regular grants, shared revenues, and emergency grants as reported by the Secretary of the Treasury in his 1946 annual report. During the fiscal year 1946 a total of $847,328,443.14 was spent in payment to the States and local units of government. This figure does not include payments to individuals within the States and Territories. If we were to include that amount, we would add another $442,000,000. I think a breakdown of these figures will be of interest to the Members, and I include them at this point in my remarks:

I am thoroughly convinced, Mr. Speaker, that these aids and grants should be thoroughly reexamined. In connection with this reexamination I think we might well ask three questions in connection with every aid and grant that is made. First, is it absolutely essential to the welfare of the Nation; second, if it is not historically and constitutionally a more proper function of the State and local governments rather than the Federal Government; and, third, if the individual States in view of their present financial condition are not better able to assume the entire responsibility for some of these activities.

I, for one, certainly want to commend the Indiana Legislature for the resolution which it adopted and sent to Members of this Congress and which has been referred to today. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SPRINGER] called it to our attention and read the resolution to the House. I would like, however, to repeat some of the words of this resolution:

> We have decided that there is no such thing as Federal aid. We know that there is no wealth to tax that is not already within the boundaries of the 48 States. So we propose henceforward to tax ourselves and take care of ourselves. We are fed up with subsidies, doles, and paternalisms. We are no one's stepchild. We have grown up. We serve notice that we will resist Washington, D. C., adopting us.

A question has been raised as to whether Members on the Republican side of the House believe that various Federal aids should be discontinued. May I make it perfectly clear that when one advocates the return to the several States of the financing of these projects it does not in any way mean that the projects should be discontinued. It does mean that the jurisdiction of the Federal Government should cease and that these projects, or some of them at least, should be controlled by the local units of government and financed by the local units of government. I, personally, am convinced that when this is done the projects not only will be continued but they will be continued in a more efficient and more economical manner.

I do not contend that there are not some of the functions presently falling under the Federal-aid program that should not be continued under the Federal program. Certainly there are some that the Federal Government must continue to play an important part in. But even those cases must be reviewed and scrutinized carefully for waste, confusion, and duplication. I would like to call the attention of the House to an excerpt from a resolution adopted by the board of managers of the Council of State Governments at Miami Beach, Fla., on December 4, 1946. I quote:

> For many years there has been developing a system of Federal grants-in-aid to the States for the support of public services.
> Most of our major governmental services, such as highways, education, public health, public welfare—are supported to a large extent through the medium of grants-in-aid systems. These systems in the various fields of public services have developed separately and independently without relation to each other, with the result that there is a different policy, different program, and different administrative procedure with respect to almost every activity. The net result has been and is overlapping, duplication, and confusion which not only result in waste of public funds but also make it extremely difficult for the States to establish and maintain a constructive and economical over-all budget system.

I am preparing and hope to have ready for introduction within the next day or two a resolution instructing the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments of this House to make a comprehensive study of the grants-in-aid system. I believe such a study is not only important from the fiscal standpoint and for the purpose of showing means whereby Federal expenditures can be reduced, but such a study is equally important from the standpoint of general governmental philosophy. It is my firm conviction that grants-in-aid as a general practice are misleading, dangerous, and uneconomical. In the first place, they tend to make the people and the local units of Government think they are getting something for nothing. In the second place, they are dangerous because they lead to the loss of the rights of States to administer functions which historically and constitutionally belong to the States and local units of Government. And in the third place, such aids are uneconomical because local units which are closer to the people will administer the activities more in accordance with local needs and with more efficiency.

When we have provided for elimination of unnecessary Federal grants and aids and when we have provided for efficiency in administering those aids that are continued we will have made a big step toward economy in the Federal Government.

In conclusion, I would like to state just a few of the suggestions on the whole picture of economy in Government. As I stated in the beginning, if we are ever to accomplish our three-fold objective of a balanced budget, payment of the national debt, and tax reduction, there must be reflected in Congress the real and genuine desire of the people to effect economy. This requires an unselfish attitude by all. Regional and district hand-outs that constitute an unjustified expense should be opposed from the very beginning by the representatives from those regions. When they oppose these unjustifiable expenses, then they are placed in a much better position to oppose unjustifiable expenditures in other regions or districts. We must get rid of the policy of desiring economy for the other fellow but not economy for ourselves. We must desire and insist upon economies that affect ourselves as well as economies that affect others.

If we are to make any real inroads into decreasing Federal expenditures, we must oppose large appropriations to benefit particular classes or groups. At the present time $7,000,000,000 annually is being spent for aid to veterans, and yet it is estimated that bills presently before the Congress provide for aid to veterans of over $26,000,000,000 on top of the $7,000,000,000 now being spent. This is unadulterated pressure. The conscientious veteran, I am convinced, knows that he is not getting anything for nothing, and that it is he who will have to pay the bill for these aids. I am convinced he would prefer a stable economy with the hope of sensible taxes in the future to a more paternalistic hand-out, as is proposed by some of the bills that have been introduced.

States and cities must stop falling into the trap of asking and taking Federal hand-outs. In this connection I would like to cite an incident that took place in Wisconsin: The State of Wisconsin is preparing to celebrate in 1948 its one-hundredth birthday as a State. Last fall I was invited to meet with members of the committee making preparations for this celebration. At the meeting the committee brought out the point that they were contemplating asking the Federal Government for around $200,000 to help defray the cost of the celebration. When I asked them how they justified such an expenditure by the Federal Government they stated, "The Federal Government has been Santa Claus for a long time. Other States got assistance for their celebrations. Why should Wisconsin sit back?" I cannot be too critical of the members of that committee for taking that attitude. After all, the people and the States and local units of government have been educated during the past 15 years to look to the Federal Government for anything they might need or desire. Federal money was being handed out right and left and everyone was educated to try to get as big a piece of the pie as possible.

For the benefit of the Members of this House, in order that they may be sure of my position, I want to say that I told this committee in no uncertain terms that as far as I was concerned I would have no part in requesting the Federal Government to furnish funds in this instance and that if the choice were left to me I would have the State of Wisconsin pay its own bills and stand on its own feet. In taking that attitude I serve warning that I must also oppose any similar appropriations for any other States.

I have consumed a good deal of your time. I have taken it only to attempt in my small way to try and impress upon this House the fact that we have reached the end of the road. That we must not only talk about cutting expenditures, but we must act in cutting expenditures. I have taken the time in order to try and emphasize a fact that should be all too clear to each of us, that decreased expenditures is the only way to get tax relief, and conversely that increased expenditures necessarily means increased taxes.

The most important problem facing the Eightieth Congress is the establishment of a sound fiscal program within the framework of an efficient, progressive, and economical governmental structure. Let us go to work on this No. 1 problem. If we make up our mind to do it, we can and will cut expenditures to the point which will make possible our three objectives of a balanced budget, a substantial payment on the national debt, and a cut in taxes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KEFAUVER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COURTNEY] is recognized for 20 minutes.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE PEACE CONFERENCES

Mr. COURTNEY. Mr. Speaker, deputies appointed by the Big Four foreign ministers are in session in London, laying the groundwork for the Conference of Foreign Ministers that will follow in Moscow for preparation of a treaty with Germany and Austria. As a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I thought it might be well early in the session to take this time in order that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD might contain for reference a résumé of the accomplishments of our peace conferences so far, and of the achievements of the United Nations toward the forging of a permanent and lasting peace. Perhaps the new Members especially would like to have this information readily available.

The following conferences prepared the groundwork for the Paris Peace Conference:

The Tripartite Conference of Berlin—Potsdam, July 17–August 2, 1945.

Allied Control Council for Germany—Berlin, July 30, 1945.

Conference of the Council of Foreign Ministers—London, September 11–October 2, 1945.

Far Eastern Advisory Commission—Washington, October 30–December 16, 1945.

Paris Conference on Reparation from Germany—Paris, November 9–December 21, 1945.

Big Three Foreign Ministers' Conference—Moscow, December 16–26, 1945.

Conference of the Big Four Foreign Ministers—Paris, April 25–May 16, 1946.

Conference of Foreign Ministers—Paris, June 15–July 12, 1946.

In the last of these conferences the divergent views of the Big Five Powers finally harmonized so as to make possible the presentation of tentative drafts of treaties to a peace conference. It was then agreed that, besides the Big Five, the 16 other states which took an active part in the fighting against the European Axis will be represented at the conference. The 16 other states included: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Byelorussia—White Russia, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Ethiopia, Greece, India, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, the Union of South Africa, the Ukraine, Yugoslavia. In addition, Albania, Egypt, Luxemburg, and Mexico sent delegations, although they were not invited.

The Conference, beginning on July 29, was held at the Luxemburg Palace in Paris. The principal objective of the Conference was to draw up peace treaties with Italy, Finland, Bulgaria, Hungary, and Rumania. The Conference continued without any recess for 79 days and ended on October 15 on a sour note with the Yugoslav delegation boycotting the final session. Despite almost endless wrangling on procedural and substantive matters, the Conference succeeded in attaining the main objective for which it had convened. Draft treaties with Finland, Bulgaria, Rumania, Hungary, and Italy were prepared and approved by the delegates of 21 nations. These draft treaties were now ready for consideration by the Big Four Council of Foreign Ministers, which was to hold its meetings in New York beginning November 4. By the terms of these treaties reparations totaling $1,350,000,000 were assessed against the defeated states: Italy, $325,000,000; Hungary, Rumania, and Finland, $300,000,000 each; and Bulgaria, $125,000,000. Of this Russia is to get $900,000,000; Yugoslavia, $212,000,000; Greece, $162,500,000; Czechoslovakia, $50,000,000; Ethiopia, $25,000,000. The Conference tried to solve the Trieste problem; it also tried to open the Danube River to international navigation and commerce; it failed to find a solution of either of these problems; and when its last meeting adjourned the split between the Soviet and western blocs on almost every major issue seemed more real than before. Secretary of State Byrnes in his report on the Paris Peace Conference—broadcast on October 18—admitted that he was disturbed by the continued if not increasing tension between the United States and Russia. From his report it became clear that the accomplishments of the Conference fell short of its expectations.

From the Potsdam Conference—

President Truman and I have worked and we shall continue to work to bring about an understanding with the Soviet Government. * * * No state should assume that it has a monopoly of virtue or of wisdom. No state should ignore or veto the aggregate sentiments of mankind. States must not unilaterally by threats, by pressures, or by force disturb the established rights of other nations. Nor can they arbitrarily resist or refuse to consider changes in the relationships between states and peoples which justice, fair play, and the enlightened sentiments of mankind demand.

On November 4 the Council of Foreign Ministers met in New York and began to consider the drafts of peace treaties with Italy, Hungary, Bulgaria, Rumania, and Finland. In the course of 33 meetings, held between November 4 and December 12, the Council concluded its session on a note of amity after completing peace treaties for Italy, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary, and Finland. The Council agreed to begin its meetings in Moscow on March 10, 1947, to work on German and Austrian treaties. Molotov gave assurances that correspondents would be provided the same facilities for reporting the meetings as in Paris and New York. Special deputies were to be appointed, to meet in London beginning January 14, 1947, to study the agenda for the German and Austrian treaty talks. It was agreed that the five treaties already drafted were to be signed in Paris on February 10 of 1947. The Ministers also agreed to place the port of Trieste under the control of an 11-nation commission—representing the Big Four and the nations served by the port—and a director named by the Governor of Trieste from candidates nominated by the Trieste Council of Government.

By the end of 1946 special deputies were appointed by the Big Four Foreign Ministers, and they began their work on January 14 in London. Even at its very inception the task of the deputies was deemed formidable. Mr. Herbert Matthews, of New York Times, reported that their task "bristles with difficulties of the most formidable sort. They must work out the procedure that their foreign ministers will follow at Moscow in March for preparation of the treaty with Germany. In addition, they are to receive the written and, where desired, oral views of the 18 associated powers that fought against Germany and Austria. Finally, the deputies, acting on the Austrian question, must prepare an agreed draft of a full-fledged treaty guaranteeing Austrian independence. For all this the deputies have 6 weeks." And even at the beginning matters of procedure proved to be as much a bugbear as ever. But the real difficulty, as of now, seems to be the role which small powers are allowed to play in the drafting of treaty with Germany. At the end of their first 10 meetings the deputies were unable to resolve this problem, the Australians insisting that they should have some part in the drafting of this treaty while Russian refusal to allow the Australians or any other power except the Big Four anything to do with it has brought matters to a deadlock. This deadlock still continues. After 11 days of work, the deputies, acting on the Austrian question, succeeded in agreeing unanimously on the first clause of the Austrian peace treaty. This merely states that the Allies recognize the reestablishment of Austria as a sovereign and independent state.

The foregoing paragraphs represent the summary of what was done at the Paris Peace Conference and what is being attempted by agencies instituted by that Conference. In short, peace treaties with Italy, Bulgaria, Finland, Hungary, and Rumania have been drafted, and these are ready for the signature of the plenipotentiaries of the states concerned; work has already begun on the drafting of peace treaties with Germany and Austria by the deputies of the Big Four Foreign Ministers. These treaties have to be drafted; they have to be approved by the Council of Foreign Ministers in their forthcoming session in Moscow; finally, these drafts have to be signed by the states concerned. Peace treaties for Japan will also have to be drafted, duly approved by the Council of Foreign Ministers, and subsequently signed by the respective states concerned. When all this has been done, then these treaties have to be put into force and their provisions will have to be carried out. By that time we will probably be prepared to begin gradual evacuation of occupation forces from occupied countries. All this and perhaps a thousand other problems resulting from World War II still await their solution. What we already have accomplished through peace conferences probably represents a modest share of the herculean task that is facing the statesmen of all nations.

And now a word about the United Nations and its accomplishments to date: Our Committee on Foreign Affairs is especially interested in this organization and fervently hopes, as I know you do, for its success. Our special interest is due to the fact that this committee assisted in laying the ground plans for the organization and has been represented at all the meetings so far held. At the preliminary conference at San Franciso, our former chairman, the Honorable SOL BLOOM, and our present chairman, the Honorable CHARLES A. EATON, were members of the United States delegation. They were members, too, of our delegation to the London and the New York meetings. At the last meeting they were joined by the distinguished gentlewoman from California, Hon. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS, also a member of our committee; and by their efforts, counsel, and advice, they were extremely helpful to the deliberations at these conferences.

May I digress here to say a word about the new chairman of our committee Dr. EATON. I had occasion several years ago on the floor of the House, to say that he is one of the ablest Members of the House, and perhaps the best loved by Republicans and Democrats alike. The years have but strengthened that opinion, and, while as a Democrat, I regret that the fortunes of war went against us last November, there is no man in the House under whose chairmanship I would rather serve than his.

THE UNITED NATIONS ORGANIZATION—ITS ACCOMPLISHMENTS

The United Nations Organization came into existence at the San Francisco Conference on International Organization—April 25–June 26, 1945. By the United Nations Charter, drafted and adopted at that Conference, the new organization is aimed to be rather more inclusive in its functions, more perfect, and more up-to-date to cope with world problems than the already defunct League of Nations. The Charter was originally signed by fifty sovereign states represented at the San Francisco Conference, and since then five more states have been added to that group of fifty.

The United Nations General Assembly held its first session in London in January and February of 1946—January 10–February 15. In conjunction with the General Assembly the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council, and the Trusteeship Council also held their sessions in London. In this first session most of the work of the Assembly was devoted to matters of organization. The Security Council, however, was given the first opportunity to test its ability and effectiveness in dealing with delicate and embarrassing issues. Such an issue was the withdrawal of Russian forces from Iran—Persia. When Russia refused to withdraw her troops from northern Iran the latter country accused Russia with interfering in its internal affairs, and on January 19, the matter was placed before the Security Council. The Council suggested that an inquiry commission be sent to study the situation on the spot; Russia refused to agree to such a suggestion; finally the Council recommended direct negotiations between the two parties concerned. This was the first test for the Security Council and in dealing with it that body really felt the heavy weight of the veto. The Council was equally unsuccessful in bringing about the withdrawal of British and French troops from Syria. Here again the Council suggested direct negotiation between the parties concerned; Syria rejected this. Later, however, agreements were signed between Syria and France, and Syria and Great Britain, by the terms of which both countries evacuated their troops from Syria.

Even before the General Assembly and the various councils of the United Nations met in London, other units of the United Nations organization were having their meetings. Thus a conference for the establishment of an educational, scientific, and cultural organization was held during the first half of November in 1945—November 1 to 16. In this conference participating countries, 44 in all, agreed to facilitate the exchange of scientific and cultural information, and a constitution was adopted. This modest achievement in itself was considered an advance step toward international intellectual cooperation.

More ambitious and more comprehensive is the aim and purpose of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations organization. It is aiming to deal with all economic problems of all nations in all parts of the world. The Economic and Social Council, when in full force, will aim to guarantee a large share of the freedoms enumerated in the Atlantic Charter. In addition there is also the Trusteeship Council which is to administer or supervise the administration of areas the inhabitants of which are not deemed capable to govern themselves.

When the General Assembly concluded its sessions in London on February 14, it was decided to have its next session in New York, sometime in the fall. Finally on October 23 the United Nations General Assembly, as well as the Security Council, began its meetings in New York with an address of welcome by President Truman. In this session the General Assembly set up six permanent committees dealing with six principal phases of its activities, namely, the Political and Security Committee, the Economic and Financial Committee, the Social, Humanitarian and Cultural Committee, the Trusteeship Committee, Administrative and Budgetary Committee, and the Legal Committee. The work of these six committees and the subsequent actions taken on their recommendation by the Assembly will now be translated into action by the standing organizations of the United Nations. Thus it is obvious that the accomplishments of the United Nations may be seen in the future rather than in its past. There has not been enough time to test its usefulness to the needs of postwar world. Its Security Council seems to be hampered in its efforts by the use of the veto; its inability to deal with the control of the atomic bomb is a case in point. The working, or the failure to work, of the various control councils of occupation in occupied countries is directly tied up with the working of the Security Council; if it is not possible to secure unanimity in the one, then it is almost impossible to arrive at a working agreement, say in Control Council for Germany. And if the military commanders in Korea cannot agree as to what is best for the welfare of the Koreans, that, too, reflects on the workings and the effectiveness of the Security Council as well as that of the General Assembly of the United Nations. Because of Council's failure to arrive at some workable understanding on the subject of atomic bomb, the Military Staff Committee of the United Nations has made no progress in its work, and the question of disarmament has not even been placed on the agenda of any meeting.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COURTNEY. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I have listened with much interest to the remarks of my distinguished colleague from Tennessee. I wish to ask the gentleman if he does not believe that the fact that our Secretaries of State and the President have seen fit to designate Members of the Senate, both Democrats and Republicans, and also Members of the House to serve in representative capacities at the San Francisco Conference and other meetings where the peace structure has been discussed and decided upon, has aided greatly in having the results of those meetings accepted by the American people and by Congress.

Mr. COURTNEY. I quite agree with the gentleman and thank him for his contribution. May I say that I intend to touch upon that very subject a little later in the course of my remarks.

And so we see, Mr. Speaker, that while we move slowly toward that ultimate objective of a permanent and a lasting peace, we are making progress and there is no reason for discouragement. We must remember that it took five long years for war to virtually tear down the pillars of civilization, rend the world asunder, and send the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse galloping to the far corners thereof. It may well be that it will take so long or longer to repair and rebuild the damage that was done and set the mind of mankind everywhere in the ways of peace.

The situation now looks far better than it did at a comparable period after World War I, when by such a time thereafter we had discarded completely President Wilson's plan for a League of Nations. I can readily understand why Wilson's dream did not prevail with and was not acceptable to the Senate and perhaps the country as a whole. At that time it was difficult to keep political differences out of our foreign policy. He virtually forged his own policy, constructive as it may have been, and realized too late that he had not from the beginning of the peace discussions taken the Congress as a whole into his close confidence, and had not sought its advice about matters of plan and procedure. This time our foreign policy is neither Democratic nor Republican. It was forged by the Executive, by and with the aid, counsel, and advice of leaders of both parties, and it is being administered by able representatives chosen from both parties, and so is as nearly a nonpartisan approach as can be attained.

Mr. Speaker, I have mentioned this personal experience of mine many times in the course of talks along this line, and once, I remember, here on the floor of the House. Perhaps a repetition will be forgiven because it made an impression upon my mind that will follow me to the grave. I was fortunate enough after World War I to be in Paris on detached military service during the Peace Conference. I had the privilege of seeing President Wilson many times, as he moved from group to group assembled there, his face shining with the high ideal and noble purpose of writing the sacrifice of our war dead into a just and eternal peace. I saw him again a few months later when, his plan discarded by the Senate, and when he had been unable, after a desperate personal appeal to the people in a speaking tour about the country, to fully arouse public opinion in his support. I happened to be in Washington then on a visit and, it being my first trip to Washington, my sister who lived here drove me about to see the sights of the city, including the home then occupied by the former President. It so happened that as I passed, he was walking in front of his home, a broken old man, his dream dead, who walked with faltering step and broken body toward his grave. The morning of his death, I remember seeing a cartoon in my local paper, drawn by that great cartoonist Carey Orr, and titled "The Chief Joins His Legions." It depicted Wilson entering the spirit world, and then drawn up in review to meet him were all the hosts of American dead: one spectral face blew upon his bugle; another raised the colors for the dead Commander in Chief, whose dream had come to naught, was taking over command of his legions of dead, whose death had come to naught.

This time, Mr. Speaker, the Executive, the Congress, and the American people are determined that such a thing must not happen again, but that the lives we lost and the treasures we so freely gave shall be written into a permanent and an enduring peace.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BISHOP in the chair). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. JACKSON] is recognized for 20 minutes.

WHERE NOW, MR. LINCOLN?

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, today in reverence and in a spirit of thanksgiving, America pays tribute to one of the greatest of her sons. It is not enough to say that Abraham Lincoln, that austere and tragic figure, was a great American. To so limit his breadth of character is to minimize the sacrifices and virtues which set his figure in bold relief on the horizon of our past national history.

For Abraham Lincoln, like the oceans, like human kindness, and like friendship, belongs to all of mankind. His memory is not one around which any people, any creed, or any race can lay lines of partition and say, "This is ours." It is said that during the Nazi invasion of Poland and the Low Countries the patriots of those lands kept among their few and precious possessions clippings which bore the immortal words of Mr. Lincoln. They were words which could have brought torture and death to the possessor had they been discovered.

Lincoln is legend, although his death has occurred within the memory of living man. He rose from the soil of his beloved land to the highest gift within the power of his people to bestow, yet he remained always the simple man, the sage prophet, the homely philosopher. Like a sudden burst of fire, he rose to meet his destiny, and in dying violently he inscribed his works and his words upon the heart of a saddened world.

This, then is the man to whom we pay tribute in this hour. He was one of the inspirational gifts of a divine power which has always raised a man to meet the challenge of a dark and foreboding era in our national history. There is no rhyme and no reason to these arisings. We can only walk in faith, secure in the knowledge that this land which did produce a man of destiny can yet in honesty and simplicity produce others to the glory of America and the world. There is not and can never be a place in this Nation for "strong" men, as we connote the word to mean tyrannical power and oppression, but there will always be a need for men strong in principle, character, determination, and faith.

In a strictly partisan sense, Abraham Lincoln was a Republican, but in the sense of great and abiding statesmanship, he was first of all an ardent exponent and a lover of all that was good in national and international life. We have a constant need of men of farsighted vision, but fate, perhaps possessed of a frugal nature, projects one upon the earthly plane but seldom.

Lincoln loved freedom—loved freedom not as a generality, but as a living fact. When he sadly set his hand to the Proclamation of Emancipation he wrote one word only—freedom, and signed the document with his own blood. But he could not, and would not, compromise his conviction "that no nation can survive half slave and half free" with any transient opportunism or political expediency. His ears must have already heard the distant rumblings of the guns across the Potomac and his sad, tired eyes must have seen the bloodied fields of a score of Gettysburgs. Still, we can imagine that the hand was steady and the eye clear as he scrawled the familiar A. Lincoln on the fateful page. Here was an intellectual honesty which no organized pressure could swerve, and no puerile argument defeat.

Mr. Lincoln was, with a stroke of his pen, culminating and bringing to fruition the dream of all the ages, the dream which had motived the men and women of all time since man, upright and dignified, had emerged from the dim mists of antiquity 4,000 years before in the Valley of the Nile. Mr. Lincoln realized then, as we must inevitably realize today, that the quest for freedom is a continuing process and that this fragile commodity must be shielded against the forces and elements which would take it from us. We do not enjoy the fruits of liberty as a divine right, but only because of the fact that men and women of all ages were willing to lay down their lives to defend it. We cannot know, but we can surmise with reason that liberty was uppermost in the minds of the slaves who toiled the great blocks of granite down the Nile River and hoisted them into place on the pyramid of Cheops. Liberty was but a flickering spark in the Valley of the Kings, in Babylon, in China and Yucatan, and the great migrations across the plains of Asia stirred it into a weak flame, which was to burst into open fire in the city-state of Athens, 500 years before the birth of Christ.

Here for the first time in the history of man, the individual was conceded a dignity of person and opinion that transcended anything known to that time. The world was preparing a way for the Mr. Lincolns as yet unborn. Here in Athens was the first franchise, here the first studious application to the sciences of humanity and of living. But even in Athens, great as it was, the relationship between men was principally and largely a relationship as between a slave and a master, as between a cringing and torn back and a hand wielding a whiplash. But there were free men in Athens, and the course of liberty was moving onward and upward. Even during the Dark Ages milestones along the highroad to freedom were multiplying and the hand of timeless destiny was drawing closer to a new world and a wilderness cabin of logs. Let those who will proclaim that there is no plan, that things happen in a helter-skelter manner, without direction, without volition. Let those who so contend, trace the course of our liberties.

Magna Carta, with all of its implications for liberty. The enunciations of men firm and united in their quest for personal freedom of action under law. Men, if you please, of initiative and enterprise, prepared to face the obstacles and exigencies of a dangerous life with a smile, so long as their hands, their hearts, and their minds remained unfettered. The moving finger wrote and, having writ, moved on, and men sailed unknown seas armed with only an unconquerable faith that somewhere there existed something greater than the world of their day had ever dreamed.

While all of the centuries were rolling past, men were dying and new civilizations were falling into step to take the place of those which had preceded them. Battles and wars for freedom were fought. Men died on the rack, on the cross, by flogging and torture. All of the forces of tyranny, of oppression—yes, of governmental control—were utilized to stem the predestined force that was leading into the hills of Kentucky. Crowns toppled, and the thrones crumbled into dust, and the frantic incantations of swaying scepters were invoked to deprive the soul of man of his privilege of owning his own soul in fee simple.

Indeed, the path was not always smooth. There were eras when it appeared that the flickering fire would burn out and that the whip was, indeed, to win the eternal struggle with the bared back. But there was always a man to fan the dying spark into new life and to add to the fire with the unquenchable fuel of human faith. In the mountain passes of Greece, in a cave in old Scotland, at Calvary, there was always a man to shield with his living flesh the hopes and the dreams of mankind. The lash had no power to reach these progenitors of our liberties, those who with sword, pen, and parable, built themselves into the very foundation work of what we now enjoy. How great an obligation is laid upon those of us who seek in these dark hours of international and domestic turmoil to hold steady to the straight path of principle and ideals.

There was no Atlantic cable, no skyway of communication to flash the word of the new world. There was only the song of a new day, but the chords spread afar and fell on the incredulous ears of the peasant at work in a feudal field as his fathers had toiled in the same fields for so many centuries. The music of hammer and saw merged with the clanging of the cathedral bells, and the bell ringer heard them. On all of the streets and all of the dark and twisting alleys of an old and tired world men heard the call to freedom. The John Smiths, the Roger Williams, the William Penns heard the call to bring strong hands and stronger hearts to a new order of things, to a hand where any man by merit and character might rise above a caste into which cruel, unthinking fate had plunged him, and where a man might rule his own life without the interference of governmental overseers.

Men came—yes; and women, too—seeking this new earth, seeking the things denied to them in the lands of their birth. Trees were being felled in the Colonies, and there were homes for those who would build them. Perhaps you could not build them on an 8-hour schedule with portal-to-portal pay, but men with a dream did not think in terms—well, let us say they were "rugged individualists," that once virtuous term now smeared with the vitriol of those who hold individualism to be incompatible with the common good. They were men and women who felt a complete interdependence one upon the other, because they were builders and not destroyers, and they early realized that the welfare of a great new land and the people who populated it depended not so much upon the drab and dreamless drones in their society as it depended upon men of vision and determination who could come face to face with the realities of frontier life and wrestle those problems into submission. Was there an onus placed upon the name of a man who built a sawmill to turn out the planed planks for the homes of all? Was there an envy in the hearts of his fellow men and women, that his ability to start from scratch and achieve a position of relative wealth and responsibility in turn gave them all an additional measure of comfort and security? Of course, there was not.

Our forefathers gladly assumed what small part there was for each to play toward building a simple and sound order of things in the interest of their new world. There was virtue to initiative, to enterprise, and to thrift when they lifted the torch of liberty and bore it with them to Philadelphia, to sign what has been so rightfully called "the greatest document ever struck off by the mind of man." Read it again. And in reading, try to find one single phrase which implies that government is the paternal agency of ultimate appeal, the all-embracing, all-knowing, all-controlling instrumentality of our individual destinies. Thank God there is nothing to imply, nothing to suggest, that this Government of ours was ever intended to be anything but an impartial arbiter of our disputes among ourselves, the provider of just law and our voice in our dealings with the other nations of the earth. The representative republic was never intended to be the guiding spirit in every waking moment of every citizen's life. Mr. Lincoln made this clear in his address to the Congress on July 27, 1848. He said, and I quote:

> We see it, and to us it appears like principle, and the best sort of principle at that—the principle of allowing the people to do as they please with their own business.

The bondage exercised by the Government over a free people was strongly opposed by Mr. Lincoln as was the bondage inflicted by one individual over the body and soul of another. There was no middle course to his direct manner of thinking. Freedom was entirely freedom or it was entirely bondage. His concept of the relationship between peoples and their governments was in direct refutation of what we have seen in our day emerge as a parasitic growth upon the classic design of the house of the Republic. Hundreds of thousands of freeborn Americans, completely indoctrinated and saturated with the dangerous delusion that the Government and its agencies can be called upon at any time to support them or to take sides in disputes between races, creeds, colors, and economic groups.

Where now, Mr. Lincoln?

The priceless heritage which is ours to enjoy, to cherish, to maintain, and in turn to pass on to our posterity is changing to ashes in our grip. Again that sacred flame, nourished by the living bodies of our dead, flickers and flutters in the vast winds of our petty discords. There is no fuel on the flame. The incentive to economic success, to the development of new and unusual tools to meet the crying need of a world in distress, the will to succeed, the determination of true achievement, all these have been subordinated by a calculated search to achieve a dull and neutral gray shade of social and economic life in which no great peaks of human achievement, of human wisdom, of human initiative can tower above the morbid plane of governmental control.

Mr. Lincoln was either entirely right or he was entirely wrong when he said—and again I quote:

> Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap, we should soon want bread. * * * When all government, in little as in great things, shall be drawn to Washington, it will become venal and oppressive.

What foresight is evident in these considered and solemn words, spoken long before the Members of this Congress were born. Yet, in spite of the relative antiquity of the phrases, they might have been spoken on the floor of this House during the course of the past several years. The people of America believe that Mr. Lincoln was right. They stamped an approval upon their ballots last November.

This is a decisive hour. This is an hour to stand up and be counted; be counted either as one who believes, as Mr. Lincoln believed—who believe as this House believes, that this land is good, that this system is good, and that the cornerstones of our Representative Republic are still initiative, freedom of enterprise in the lawful conduct of economic affairs, and a just profit on an honest investment. The only alternative to this is chaos and anarchy, and the American public have a right to demand that those who are not prepared to stand in honesty and forthrightness for these principles, step out of offices of authority and yield their places to men and women who believe that the Representative Republican form is the greatest political concept in all history. We must, if we believe in the Washingtons, the Jeffersons, and the Lincolns of our history, believe in freedom of the individual to decide when and where he will work, and under what conditions of employment. We cannot believe it a proper function of Government to coerce either management or labor, except as presently necessary to restore some semblance of balance to a situation in which the dice are loaded and Government is anything in the world but an impartial and fair arbiter. If Government, as such, is to ever regain its rightful position of dignity, and again achieve the respect of the American people, it must cease to be a biased referee, who appears to be constantly beating one or another of the parties to any given argument over the head. If such punitive measures showed any indication of knitting us together as a unit, there might be some argument advanced for the disagreeable practice, but to date, the tactics have served only to set race against race, labor against management, creed against creed, minority against minority, and citizen against citizen.

These are days in which our vision is sometimes obscured, and we see as through a glass darkly. The tempests of passion and controversy which swirl about this House and about our beloved land are confusing and ofttimes depressing. But they are not new. George Washington knew them, and Abraham Lincoln was enveloped by them. It is no moment for recrimination and vilification. It is rather an hour for cautious deliberation, for remedies carefully weighed in the scale of public interest, and then for rapid and certain action. Whatever course we pursue, we must pursue it in the certain knowledge that it will not be universally popular. That philosophy was, more than anything else, the strength of Mr. Lincoln, as it must be the strength of any man who is to be remembered in this House as anything more than a name on a roll call. Popularity purchased at the price of expediency can prosper no man beyond tomorrow's letters and today's telegrams, and the faulty steel of the sword of opportunism has caused more fatalities in the arena of politics than has the steel-pointed pen of principle, wielded with determination and in defense of personal dignity and individual freedom.

Mr. Lincoln believed that what prospered the majority of the American people, prospered the minority, as he believed, and I quote:

> A majority held in restraint by constitutional checks and limitations, and always changing easily with deliberate changes of popular opinions and sentiments, is the only true sovereign of a free people. Whoever rejects it does, of necessity, fly to anarchy or to despotism. Unanimity is impossible; the rule of a minority as a permanent arrangement is wholly inadmissible. So that, rejecting the majority principle, anarchy or despotism in some form is all that is left. (First inaugural address, March 4, 1861.)

The winds of hatred may be expected to blow, the torrents of criticism may be expected to rain upon our heads, and the raging waters of alien philosophy may be expected to assault anew the very foundations of this great institution, but so long as we keep with us the constant remembrance of the simple and honest dignity of the man to whom we today pay a small measure of tribute, we shall leave these legislative halls with heads high and with conscience clear.

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GILLIE] is recognized for 20 minutes.

THE FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE OF CATTLE IN MEXICO

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that more Members of the agricultural group are not here at this time, because I have a very important message. I wish to speak this afternoon about the foot-and-mouth disease that has gotten into Mexico and at this time is raging over great portions of that republic, in fact, in 10 of her States.

I have just placed an emergency bill in the hopper authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to extend full scientific, technical, and financial cooperation to the Republic of Mexico to combat this epidemic.

Under present Federal statutes, the Department of Agriculture has authority to cooperate informally with foreign governments in suppressing outbreaks of this dread disease. Present authority, however, does not extend to engaging in eradication programs on a substantial scale, even when requested to do so by foreign officials.

My bill removes this limitation and authorizes the United States Government to mobilize its full resources in combating outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease in any American country where such outbreaks present a direct threat to our vast livestock industry.

This legislation has been introduced at the request of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Mexican-United States Agricultural Commission, based on the findings of a joint Mexican-United States veterinary survey committee which has surveyed the situation in Mexico. The findings and recommendations of this committee will be appended to my remarks, but, in brief, they are as follows:

First. That foot-and-mouth disease has been existent in Mexico for approximately 3 months.

Second. That the disease has invaded at least 9 States and the Federal District, comprising a vast area between Mexico City and Vera Cruz.

Third. That the disease has already become so widespread as to constitute a grave danger to the livestock industry of the United States.

Fourth. That the facilities of Mexico alone are insufficient to successfully cope with the situation.

Fifth. That full cooperation between the Governments of Mexico and the United States is imperative if the disease is to be wiped out, and the threat to American livestock removed.

Mr. Speaker, though known for centuries to be one of the world's most contagious and devastating livestock maladies, foot-and-mouth disease has been curbed in the United States by veterinary science. The United States has repelled eight invasions of this disease, and since 1929 has been entirely free from it. Each outbreak, by prompt work of the Bureau of Animal Industry, in cooperation with the States, has been stamped out as quickly as possible.

Dr. John R. Mohler, for many years Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, has estimated that the entire cost to the livestock industry and to the State and Federal Governments of these eight outbreaks exceeds $200,000,000. The most serious outbreak was in 1914, when it was necessary to slaughter 172,222 head of cattle, hogs, and sheep in 22 States, at a cost of nearly $6,000,000.

The malady is caused by a virus so infective that it will cause the disease in dilutions as great as 1 to 10,000,000. Practically all cloven-footed animals, including deer and other wild animals, are susceptible. In malignant form, foot-and-mouth disease may kill or render valueless fully half the animals in a herd. The disease also permanently impairs the productivity of animals less severely affected. Man is fairly resistant to the infection but sometimes acquires it. He may also carry it on his clothing. Infection, however, has been most commonly traced to affected animals, their fresh meat and milk, unsterilized garbage, and other contaminated products.

There are various methods of eradication, once the disease has gained a foothold, but the slaughter method is accepted as the most effective. It is much wiser to slaughter a few animals than to allow such a costly disease to become permanently established, as it has in most nations of the world.

The United States Department of Agriculture has issued a summary of developments in the Mexican outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, and the following information is based on this report:

The outbreak first occurred in the State of Vera Cruz in east-central Mexico and has spread, since late in 1946, to nine Mexican States and the Federal district—for the most part in a westerly direction.

The area containing the affected herds is under quarantine maintained by Mexican authorities with the aid of troops. About 2,000,000 head of cattle are estimated to be in the quarantined area and about 9,000,000 in other parts of Mexico.

At the invitation of the Mexican authorities, the United States has five veterinarians, all experienced in foot-and-mouth disease control, on the scene of the outbreak to render technical assistance. Another is organizing the border defenses.

Since the outbreak in Mexico no cases of foot-and-mouth disease have appeared in the United States, nor have any appeared in the northern States of Mexico. The nearest affected herd is about 350 miles from the border.

One area of potential danger is in the vicinity of Matamoros, Mexico, near the Texas border close to the Gulf coast, approximately opposite Brownsville, Tex.

As far as can be determined, comparatively few of the affected cattle in Mexico have been slaughtered as a means of control and eradication.

Officials of the Bureau of Animal Industry, though lacking in authority to engage in disease eradication work in Mexico, are prepared to take such action immediately if cases of foot-and-mouth disease appear in the United States.

The Bureau already has selected, for the purpose, qualified key veterinarians, and instructed them to be ready for immediate assignment. Much of the equipment already is available.

The origin of the outbreak in Mexico is of particular interest in view of the repeated charges that the sanitary embargo against South American livestock was a smoke screen used by United States livestock interests to avoid competition. The disease came to Mexico through the importation of zebu bulls from Brazil, where foot-and-mouth disease is known to exist. A relatively small shipment of approximately 130 head was received in October 1945. Our Government immediately protested the acceptance of this shipment as being in violation of the sanitary treaty between this country and Mexico. The protests were ignored and after a brief quarantine period on Sacrificios Island adjacent to Vera Cruz, the bulls were allowed to land. Eighteen head were subsequently moved into the southern part of Texas.

There is no record that this first shipment of bulls brought foot-and-mouth disease with them, and the few head now in Texas are under the closest scrutiny.

A strong protest was again made late in March 1946, when information was received that a second and larger shipment was being assembled in Brazil for consignment to Mexico. As the protests were unavailing, the Secretary of Agriculture on May 28, closed the border to Mexican cattle.

At a meeting of the Mexican-United States Agricultural Commission held in Los Angeles in July, it was agreed that these bulls would either be returned to Brazil or shipped to Europe for relief purposes. However, the Mexican officials permitted these bulls to move from the quarantined island to the mainland, and in September, 327 of them were transferred to a ranch in the state of Vera Cruz not far from the port.

In a very short time after the bulls were moved to this ranch, foot-and-mouth disease broke out among them and among other cattle on this ranch. However, no report of this outbreak was made to the American Government until December 18, and our veterinarians did not definitely diagnose the malady as foot-and-mouth disease until December 26.

The border quarantine, which had been lifted by our Government on October 18—at the height of the meat famine—was, of course, immediately reimposed. A strict quarantine has been in effect since that time.

From December 31 to January 3, representatives of the Department of Agriculture, meeting in Washington, discussed problems of control and eradication with two Mexican officials. It was arranged that the Bureau of Animal Industry would detail four veterinarians to Mexico to join a like number representing that Government to make an intensive survey with a view to determining as nearly as possible the extent, spread, and the various conditions and circumstances that would influence control and eradication measures.

In the meantime a number of bulls from the second importation had been moved to ranches in Mexico, near the Texas border at Brownsville. At the time the Mexican officials were in Washington in early January this was a subject of discussion and Bureau officials were assured that the animals would be removed to south-central Mexico, but the latest information I have is that the bulls have not as yet been moved.

Several conferences on the situation between Mexican and United States officials were held during the month of January, both in Washington and in Mexico City, and certain agreements were reached.

As a result of these conferences, the Secretary of Agriculture directed letters last Friday to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, reporting on the outbreak, pointing out the danger to the American food supply and American livestock and dairy interests, and urging that legislation be enacted which would enable the United States to cooperate with Mexico in stamping out foot-and-mouth disease.

The Secretary's request followed resolutions adopted by the joint Mexican-United States Agricultural Commission recommending immediate and adequate scientific, technical, and financial cooperation between the two countries toward the control and eradication of the disease. The Mexican and United States Governments have exchanged diplomatic notes accepting these recommendations:

The recommendations include:

First. The sending to Mexico promptly of essential equipment and personnel.

Second. The utmost control to prevent the movement of susceptible animals out of Zone 1—the affected area—and to prevent the movement of such animals into Zone 1 except for immediate slaughter.

Third. A methodical disposal of all susceptible animals in newly infected and directly exposed herds or flocks by immediate destruction on the premises, followed by thorough disinfection of the latter, and an orderly movement, to slaughterhouses within the zone, of animals in herds not yet affected or entirely recovered and which are apparently healthy.

Fourth. The immediate destruction of all wild ruminants and wild swine in this zone and such adjacent areas as may be necessary.

Fifth. That steps be taken immediately to establish, at the earliest possible time, a joint Mexican-United States foot-and-mouth disease research organization, providing within the affected zone the necessary buildings, equipment, funds, and personnel.

Sixth. That whenever foot-and-mouth disease appears outside the presently affected area, designated zone 1, the method of immediate destruction of susceptible animals in affected or directly exposed herds or flocks, as well as wild ruminants and wild swine that may be exposed, be adopted and applied in all instances.

In asking for additional legislation to cope with the Mexican emergency, the Secretary pointed out that Congress has long recognized the serious nature of foot-and-mouth disease by its action to prohibit the importation of livestock from countries where the disease is present.

The Secretary also stated that in the past, Congress has authorized special funds with which to complete successful eradication measures in this country during former foot-and-mouth disease outbreaks.

On January 21, it being apparent that emergency legislation probably would be needed to deal with the situation, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE], chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, appointed a special five-man subcommittee to study problems arising from the epidemic in Mexico. Members of this subcommittee, in addition to myself, are Mr. SIMPSON of Illinois; Mr. BRAMBLETT, of California; Mr. WORLEY, of Texas; and Mr. GRANGER, of Utah.

On January 22, our foot-and-mouth subcommittee held informal hearings and received testimony from representatives of several leading farm organizations, including the Texas and Southwest Cattle Raisers Association, the American National Livestock Association, the National Association of Farmer Cooperatives, the National Cooperative Milk Producers Association, the American Farm Bureau Federation, and the Grange.

All who testified expressed very grave concern and alarm over the outbreak of this disease in Mexico. They expressed the belief that it would inevitably spread to the United States if prompt and effective action were not taken. They pledged their united support to any United States program for combatting the disease, and said that they were unanimously in favor of United States aid to the Mexican Government.

Two immediate protective steps were recommended to our subcommittee:

First. That the United States expedite the construction of a barbed-wire fence along the entire United States-Mexican border.

Second. That funds should be provided to augment the present entirely inadequate force of United States inspectors now assigned to the border.

Livestock leaders asserted that the first attack should be directed against spread of the disease north of the present area of infection, by promptly slaughtering all newly infected cattle in this section. This, they asserted, would give us time to breathe and map plans for wiping out the disease entirely.

Unless the disease is stamped out in Mexico, it was pointed out, it will be a perpetual hazard to United States livestock. The danger zone is not confined to the Mexican border area alone. The disease is just as likely to spread to New York as it is to Texas because it can be carried by human beings, it was said.

Our subcommittee has been in constant contact with officials of the Bureau of Animal Industry, including Dr. B. T. Simms, its Chief, and Dr. S. O. Fladness, the assistant chief. Both have participated in conferences with Mexican Government officials concerning the outbreak, and have assisted in mapping plans for joint United States-Mexican action to control and eradicate the disease. I have the utmost confidence in these men, and in their associates. They are capable of putting up a most effective fight against this outbreak if Congress acts promptly to give them the necessary funds and authority.

I would like to insert, at this point in the RECORD, the resolutions of the Animal Industry Subcommittee of the Mexican-United States Agricultural Commission, which have been approved by both the Mexican and the United States sections of the Commission:

Resolution I

Resolutions of the Animal Industry Subcommittee of the Mexican-United States Agricultural Commission which have been approved by both the Mexican and the United States sections of the Mexican-United States Agricultural Commission

Whereas the Animal Industry Subcommission of the Mexican-United States Agricultural Commission recognizes the existence of foot-and-mouth disease in Mexico as reported to it by joint Mexican-United States Veterinary Investigating Committee.

Whereas the disease has already become so widespread as to constitute a grave danger to the livestock industries of Mexico, the United States, and other countries, thus rendering the facilities of Mexico alone insufficient to successfully cope with this disease which constitutes an international problem.

The Animal Industry Subcommission, therefore, recommends:

Immediate and adequate scientific, technical, and financial cooperation between the Governments of Mexico and the United States in all measures looking toward the control and eradication of foot-and-mouth disease in Mexico.

MEXICO, D. F., January 25, 1947.

Resolution II

Whereas the Animal Industry Subcommission of the Mexican-United States Agricultural Commission considers that the most urgent and immediate need in the foot-and-mouth disease situation in Mexico is the establishment and maintenance of an extremely rigid quarantine around the area where the disease presently exists, pending application of further control and eradication measures; and

Whereas much additional equipment and technical personnel are absolutely essential in the establishment and maintenance of such a quarantine, the Animal Industry Subcommission of the Mexican-United States Agricultural Commission recommends that the Government of the United States, as an initial measure of cooperation in the joint campaign for control and eradication of this disease, secure and dispatch to Mexico at the earliest possible moment, such essential equipment as well as personnel as may be needed.

MEXICO, D. F., January 27, 1947.

Resolution III

Considering:

That foot-and-mouth disease has already been existent in Mexico for an approximate period of 3 months.

That the disease has invaded at least eight States, comprising an area vast in extent—designated as zone 1, approximately 250 kilometers from north to south and 500 kilometers from west to east.

That the comparatively low mortality from the disease and the present existence of a large number of recovered animals has caused public interest to relax, thus rendering most necessary a carefully studied program of public education and propaganda, not only among the people of the affected area, but also in the remainder of the Republic.

That the population of zone 1 is almost 6,000,000 people, which represents a little less than one-third of the people in the nation, and that there are estimated to be at least 1,000,000 affected or exposed susceptible domestic animals in zone 1, including at least 650,000 cattle.

That any campaign for eradication of the disease can be expected to seriously upset the economy of this zone and affect that of the entire country.

That the costs involved in any control and eradication campaign must be expected to be enormous.

That extremely variable topographical and climatic conditions present definite obstacles to the ultimate success of a rapid campaign for eradication.

That there exist great limitations in readily available technical personnel, in equipment, and in materials, and finally,

That it will be necessary to carry out a radical destruction of all wild ruminants and wild swine in the zone, which of itself constitutes a formidable undertaking.

The Animal Industry Subcommission of the Mexican and United States Agricultural Commission recommends:

1. The utmost control to prevent the movement of susceptible animals and dangerous products out of zone 1 and to prevent the movement of any such animals into zone 1, except for immediate slaughter.

2. A methodical disposal of all susceptible animals in newly infected and directly exposed herds or flocks by immediate destruction on the premises, followed by thorough disinfection of the latter, and an orderly movement to local slaughterhouses within the zone of animals in herds not yet affected or entirely recovered and which are apparently healthy.

3. The immediate destruction of all wild ruminants and wild swine in this zone and such adjacent areas as may be necessary.

4. That steps be taken immediately to establish at the earliest possible time a joint Mexican-United States foot-and-mouth disease research organization, providing within the affected zone the necessary buildings, equipment, funds, and personnel.

5. That whenever foot-and-mouth disease appears outside the presently affected area, designated zone 1, the method of immediate destruction of susceptible animals in affected or directly exposed herds or flocks, as well as wild ruminants and wild swine, that may be exposed, followed by the thorough disinfection of the premises involved, be adopted and applied in all instances.

MEXICO, D. F., January 27, 1947.

Senate Joint Resolution 2

Joint resolution relative to memorializing and petitioning the Congress of the United States to pass appropriate legislation to control and eradicate and prevent from entrance into this country of the disease of animals known as foot-and-mouth disease (apthous fever) now present among animals of several States of the Republic of Mexico

Whereas the United States Department of Agriculture has been advised by the United States Embassy in Mexico City, Mexico, that the disastrous livestock disease known as foot-and-mouth disease has appeared and exists widespread in several States of the Republic of Mexico, and diagnosis of the disease has been confirmed by both Mexican and United States Government veterinarians who have conducted extensive field investigations; and

Whereas the United States Government through action of the Secretary of Agriculture on December 30, 1946, added Mexico to the list of countries in which foot-and-mouth disease exists and thereby prohibited the importation into the United States from that country of cattle, sheep, or other domestic ruminants, or swine, and the meat thereof; and

Whereas in accordance with the terms of the Mexico-United States Sanitary Treaty, the United States Department of Agriculture will continue to cooperate with the Mexican authorities in dealing with this serious threat to the livestock industries of the two countries, including the production of meat and milk in the United States; and

Whereas the present outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in the Republic of Mexico apparently has existed there for some time and may be associated with the importation of Zebu bulls from the Republic of Brazil; and

Whereas there have been outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease in the United States in the past, including two in the State of California, and these have been eradicated only after great expenditure of public funds and losses to livestock owners; and

Whereas the method of eradication used in previous outbreaks in the United States has been to destroy or burn or deeply bury all animals in affected herds and those directly exposed thereto, the last outbreak in the United States being in 1929; and

Whereas any disruption of our food producing processes would be serious to the public welfare, the disruption of commerce and the adverse effect on the economic life of the people would be disastrous, and the difficulties and expenses that would be entailed in effectively eradicating this disease, should it spread to California, would be tremendous; and

Whereas time is of the essence if this disease is not to be permitted to spread to the United States; and

Whereas it appears that the Government of the Republic of Mexico may need immediately the expert assistance and the financial help of the Government of the United States in curtailing this disease; and

Whereas it is to the immediate interest of all the people of the United States that the disease be controlled and eradicated in the Republic of Mexico before it is permitted to spread to the United States; and

Whereas the full administrative and financial assistance required by the United States to deal with the present outbreak in Mexico may not be included in existing laws, involving expenditures in a foreign country in the interest of the people of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the President and the Congress of the United States are hereby respectfully memorialized and requested to take such steps as may be necessary, by legislation or otherwise:

(a) To appropriate adequate funds to the United States Bureau of Animal Industry to prevent, control, and eradicate foot-and-mouth disease in this country;

(b) To provide assistance to the Republic of Mexico in locating, diagnosing, and eradicating foot-and-mouth disease in that country to the fullest extent permitted and requested by the appropriate officials of that country;

(c) To create a joint United States-Mexico commission empowered to deal with this problem and to control, eradicate, and prevent the spread of foot-and-mouth disease in each of said countries;

(d) To close the United States-Mexico border, in addition to the present quarantine regulations, to all importations or traffic of whatever kind or nature that may carry the infection of the foot-and-mouth disease into this State; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate is hereby directed, forthwith, to send a copy of this joint resolution by telegram and by mail to the President of the United States, the President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Department of Agriculture, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture of the United States Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives and to the Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives in the Congress from the State of California.

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLIE. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. D'EWART. What does the gentleman think of the danger of this disease being brought into the United States by the spring flight of birds from the South to the North?

Mr. GILLIE. The danger, of course, is very, very great. In the first place, you must consider that the foot-and-mouth disease is one of the worst if not the worst disease that we have to contend with in modern history. There are several ways in which this infection can be carried. It is carried by birds, but that is not the principal way in which it is spread. It is carried by the carrion, by the crows and by pigeons. It is carried more by pigeons from one farm to another, from one farm that has it to another farm. It is carried that way. While birds are not so important, probably, the general source of infection is by meat and meat products. It is carried on your clothes, it is carried from one place to another in that way, it is carried by automobiles going from one farm to another, it is carried by corn or grain of any kind going from one farm to another, also by hay and garbage. That is the principal source of spreading the disease.

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman is to be complimented in bringing to the attention of the Congress a very real threat to the livestock industry and agriculture of this country. This cannot be too forcibly brought home to the Members of Congress and I wish to compliment the gentleman for bringing this before us.

Mr. GILLIE. May I say that I remember very well in 1941 when this epidemic broke in my State of Indiana and my county. We had several herds that were completely destroyed. Along with Government officials I assisted in trying to eradicate the disease and I know from first hand knowledge about the situation. Certainly we do not want to have it in our country under any circumstances and we must do our best at any cost to keep this disease out of the United States. No matter how much it may cost, it is a whole lot better to fight the disease in Mexico than to have it come into this country.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLIE. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to join with my colleague from Montana in complimenting the gentleman and at the same time to offer him my wholehearted support in anything that we can do to keep this disease beyond our borders. It is within 300 miles of the international border now and the livestock people all over the Southwest especially as well as throughout the West, are tremendously apprehensive and crying out to us to do something to stop the spread and ravages of this terrible disease.

Mr. GILLIE. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein two resolutions, a resolution of the Animal Industry Subcommittee of the Mexican-United States Agricultural Commission that has been approved by both the Mexican and United States sections of the Commission and also copy of Joint Resolution No. 2 of the California State Legislature.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE REORGANIZATION ACT OF 1946

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946—section 138—provides for a joint legislative committee which shall report to the two Houses of Congress, not later than February 15, a legislative budget for the ensuing fiscal year, "including the estimated over-all Federal receipts and expenditures for such year," and a recommendation fixing the maximum amount to be appropriated for that year, including a reserve for deficiencies if deemed necessary.

The act also provides for a concurrent resolution, subject to action by both Houses, recommending adoption of the joint committee's report and fixing the total to be appropriated for the ensuing year and providing for an increase in the public debt if the estimated expenditures exceed the estimated receipts. If the situation is reversed the report is to recommend a decrease in debt. The purpose of this legislation is highly desirable.

It is always important and it has always been important—and in our present financial condition it is more important than it has ever been before—to correlate revenue and expenditure and use every effort to reduce expenses, and to make as substantial a payment upon the public debt as the public revenues may warrant. But the joint committee has now been operating for some time, and it becomes increasingly evident that any attempt at this time to fix the over-all totals, of either revenue or expenditures, would be purely speculative. The data are not available. The Committees and the Subcommittees on Appropriations, for example, have had no opportunity to bring in the representatives of the departments or time to make their own investigation and to fix any even tentative figure with any assurance of accuracy.

So, Mr. Speaker, I have introduced this afternoon a joint resolution amending section 138 (a) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 to change the date by which the joint committee must make its report from February 15 to April 15, a delay of 2 months.

Three purposes will be effectuated by that delay. In the first place, the committees of the House and the subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations will by that time have had opportunity to hold hearings and to correlate essential data, and we will have available some definite factual information upon which to predicate a conclusion as to the total of appropriations needed and a clearer view of the business outlook and the total revenue expectations.

Furthermore, the routine business of the Congress will be expedited. The time of the committees and of the most experienced men on these committees has been diverted for the time being to this futile work of trying to shape conclusions in the absence of necessary factual data when they should have been engaged and should now be engaged in whipping into shape appropriation bills to be reported to the House. Within the experience of the oldest Members here we have never been so far behind as we are today with the preparation of the annual appropriation bills, and if we are to adjourn within the time that has been indicated—somewhere near July 1—it is high time that instead of longer diverting the attention of the key men on these committees to so impractical a task we permit them to turn their attention to the transaction of the regular business of the House in conducting hearings and examining the necessary data and investigating the Government's requirements in detail in order to get the appropriation bills into the House and over to the Senate in time for enactment before the end of the fiscal year.

The third reason is that a very large proportion of these expenditures are in support of the armed services, and for diplomatic and international activities. We will not know until after the Moscow Conference, which convenes in March, just what our international relations and our world responsibilities will be. The determination of the Moscow Conference will aid materially, if not decisively, in determining the amount of money we will require for national defense and for international obligations.

At this time this largest segment of the public expenditure must remain wholly indeterminate until we know what our world commitments are to be, and what will be the requirements for expenditures in international affairs in the next fiscal year. If we would delay this report until April 15 we could, in the meantime, proceed immediately to the routine work of the Congress and get the appropriation on the legislative program of the Congress under way we would have an opportunity to accumulate and evaluate facts upon which to predicate an over-all figure for expenditure and revenue, and so actually proceed to achieve the real and very commendable purpose of the Reorganization Act.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, there is a widespread misapprehension as to the purpose and function of the President's budget. A great many seem to have the idea that when the President's budget comes down we are expected to adhere rigidly to the figures written in the budget message. Nothing could be further from actual budgetary procedure. If that were true, it would be unnecessary for the Congress to act at all; it would be left to the President. As a matter of fact, as will be observed from the disposition of the President's budgetary recommendations, ever since the adoption of the budget system, that the President's figures are merely an over-all ceiling above which the Congress is not expected to go.

It has been reported repeatedly in the newspapers and on the radio that members of the Committee on Appropriations or members of the House of Representatives have said that the President's budget could not be cut. Why, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am able to determine no such statement was ever made by any Member of the Congress and certainly not by any member of the Committee on Appropriations. That would be absurd. We have every year cut the President's budget and cut it materially. Of course, when the President sends the budget down to us he expects us to adhere to it as closely as our findings permit. At least expects us not to go above it, but naturally he expects it to be cut as much as the situation will permit and as deeply as changing conditions and further study will justify—not arbitrary cuts arrived at by wishful thinking but any reductions supported by factual findings. The activities of the Government are so numerous and diversified, touch so many sections of the globe, and so many factors of our economic life, that considerations may have changed materially between the time the estimates were prepared and revised and the time they were considered by Congress.

I want to say, too, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is the desire of all minority members of the Committee on Appropriations, to cooperate in reducing expenditures of government. It is imperative. It must be effected wherever it will not interfere with the efficiency of the functions of government.

And at the same time national revenues must be maintained. When appropriations are deducted from the national income there must be sufficient funds remaining with which to make substantial reductions in the national debt.

In these prosperous times, with the largest national income in the history of the Republic, we cannot continue to carry undiminished a national debt of such magnitude that annual payments of $5,000,000,000 will not extinguish it for 50 years to come.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that so far as the minority of the committee are concerned, if there should be any variation either one way or the other, we believe we should cut the budget too much rather than not cut it enough, we are now setting a standard which will be remembered for many years to come. If we are to err at all, let us err on the side of rigid retrenchment.

We announced such a program during debate on the last appropriation bill before the House last August. It is our purpose to continue that program of rescission and retrenchment which we so effectively put into operation in the Seventy-ninth Congress. We have in mind the objective laid down by the President in his 1947 budget message in which he looked forward to an ultimate peacetime budget of $25,000,000,000. We shall not be able to attain that objective immediately. We cannot cut off war activities and war expenditures overnight. It took us 3 years to reach the peak of the war effort. Necessarily, the liquidation of wartime agencies likewise requires time. But just as rapidly as it can be effected, we expect to cooperate in the retrenchment of expenditures and, wherever possible, in the reduction of the budget.

There are other requirements. The mail must be delivered. Taxes must be collected. Veterans must be rehabilitated. Farm guaranties must be fulfilled. Our armed forces must be maintained at a strength sufficient to insure national safety and international respect.

These are obligations resting on the Eightieth Congress. Let there be no misapprehension as to our purpose on this side of the aisle to cooperate in every well-considered proposal to discharge them fully and effectively.

We can best effect all these objectives and expedite the work of the Congress by deferring until April 15—until such time as we have information and experience on which to base the determinations required by the Legislative Reorganization Act—the report of the joint committee. The passage of the joint resolution will render it possible to make this provision of the Reorganization Act a service instead of a mere formality.

SENATE

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1947

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, Almighty God, for the rich heritage of this good land; for the evidences of Thy favor in the past; and for the Hand that hath made and preserved us a nation. We thank Thee for the men and women who, by blood and sweat, by toil and tears, forged on the anvil of their own sacrifice all that we hold dear. May we never lightly esteem what they obtained at a great price. Grateful for rights and privileges, may we be conscious of duties and obligations.

On this day we thank Thee for the inspiration that breathes in the memory of Abraham Lincoln, and we pray that something of the spirit that was his may be ours today. Like him, may we be more concerned that we are on Thy side, than that Thou art on ours. In our hearts may there be, as there was in his, malice toward none and charity for all; that we may, together, with Thy blessing and help, "bind up the Nation's wounds, and do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations." Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

PROTEST AGAINST UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter and resolution I have received from Donald B. Cloward, of the Council on Christian Social Progress of the Northern Baptist Convention, stating that this organization has gone on record as opposing universal military training.

There being no objection, the letter and resolution were referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COUNCIL ON CHRISTIAN SOCIAL PROGRESS OF THE
NORTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION,
New York, N. Y., January 30, 1947.

To the Members of the Eightieth Congress.

HONORABLE SIRS: The Northern Baptist Convention, representing 1,500,000 Baptists from Maine to California, is on official record as opposed to universal military training.

I have been asked to forward the Grand Rapids resolution bearing on this vital matter to the Members of the Congress. The resolution speaks for itself and was unanimously endorsed on May 25, 1946 in Grand Rapids, Mich., by the largest gathering of delegates in the history of our convention.

Every major denomination has taken a similar action in recent months, and the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America has also registered its opposition. Protestantism, therefore, is united in its opposition to what is in fact compulsory peacetime conscription.

We earnestly and respectfully urge the Congress to defeat any universal military training bill that may be presented during the present session.

Respectfully yours,
DONALD B. CLOWARD,
Executive Secretary, Council on Christian Social Progress.

III. NATIONAL AFFAIRS

3. (d) Peacetime military conscription:

Whereas to enact peacetime military conscription is a radical departure from the principles and practices of this Nation from the days of its foundation; and

Whereas history and experience have proved again and again that large compulsory military establishments have never succeeded in preventing wars in the past; and

Whereas an enduring peace can only be built on good will and mutual confidence; and

Whereas to build a permanent peacetime army by compulsory peacetime conscription will only arouse the fear and suspicion of other nations; and

Whereas the evil effects of military life would have a harmful influence upon the morals of our youth; and

Whereas the undemocratic practices involved in our Army system fill the enlisted men with disaffection for army life: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Northern Baptist Convention, through its council on Christian social progress, express to the Congress of the United States its opposition to compulsory military conscription in time of peace and that local churches and individual members be urged to take similar action; furthermore be it

Resolved, That the Northern Baptist Convention approve the Martin resolution, which calls upon all nations to give up peacetime military conscription.

LETTER FROM BUSINESSMEN OF SALINA, KANS., RELATING TO REDUCTION IN EXPENDITURES, ETC.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter I have received from four businessmen of Salina, Kans., relating to reduction in expenditures, labor laws, rental control, building controls, sugar control, and reduction of taxes be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SALINA, KANS., February 8, 1947.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We understand that Members of the Congress pay some attention to the mail received from their constituents, and that a preponderance of mail for or against an issue is considered.

Based on the above, we wish to go on record on the following:

1. Reduction in expenditure: We think this is axiomatic. If a million of the present employees cannot be dropped this year, strive to lop off a half million; but get started on the way as soon as possible and keep at it until the present oversupply is brought under control.

2. Labor laws: We believe that the present laws should be overhauled with the intent to take away any special privileges now enjoyed by either employer or employee.

3. Rent control: How anyone can defend this law is beyond our comprehension. To us it is the rawest kind of class legislation, and one of the major factors in the present housing shortage.

4. Building controls: Remove all of them as soon as possible thereby helping the veterans to secure living quarters, and at the same time dispensing with a bureau and some bureaucrats.

5. Sugar control: This should be abolished forthwith. Also, allotments of sugar to foreign nations should be investigated by Congress at once.

6. Reduction of taxes: While this is desirable, we think a reduction of the national debt should be kept in mind and a substantial payment made each year.

We thank you.

Yours truly,

FRANK BUSBOOM,
JOE RAUH,
CHAS. G. GRAY,
R. B. DODDS.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE IN THE SOUTHWEST

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an important letter I have received from Will J. Miller, of the Kansas Livestock Association, in regard to the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in the Southwest.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KANSAS LIVESTOCK ASSOCIATION,
Topeka, Kans., February 8, 1947.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: As you know, we are all very much concerned about the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Old Mexico and are informed from Washington that a bill authorizing United States participation in this vital matter is ready for submission in Congress, hearings to start early next week.

Since this disease is such a terrible threat to our livestock industry, we would like you to give every possible support to the bill mentioned and to an appropriation act to implement the bill which is to follow.

We would urge your careful consideration of the entire matter, but feel satisfied that the proposed bill should be enacted and is, perhaps, the best measure possible at this time.

Thanks in advance for your support of this most important legislation.

Sincerely yours,

WILL J. MILLER,
Executive Secretary.

AMENDMENT OF CRIMINAL CODE RELATING TO RECEIVING STOLEN PUBLIC PROPERTY.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, at the request of the Attorney General, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend section 48 of the Criminal Code relating to the receiving of stolen public property. I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with a letter dated February 10, addressed to me by the Attorney General, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and, without objection, the bill and letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 563) to amend section 48 of the Criminal Code relating to the receiving of stolen public property, introduced by Mr. WILEY (by request), was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 48 of the Criminal Code (35 Stat. 1098; 18 U. S. C. 101) be, and it hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 48. Whoever shall receive, conceal, or aid in concealing, or shall have or retain in his possession with intent to convert to his own use or gain, any money, property, record, voucher, or valuable thing whatever, of the moneys, goods, chattels, records, or property of the United States, which has theretofore been embezzled, stolen, or purloined by any other person, knowing the same to have been embezzled, stolen, or purloined, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both; and such person may be tried either before or after the conviction of the principal offender."

The letter presented by Mr. WILEY was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 10, 1947.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Under existing law (18 U. S. C. 101), it is a criminal offense for a person to receive, conceal, aid in concealing, or have in his possession with intent to convert to his own use "any money, property, record, voucher, or valuable thing whatever, of the moneys, goods, chattels, records, or property of the United States, which has theretofore been embezzled, stolen, or purloined by any other person, knowing the same to have been so embezzled, stolen, or purloined."

The provisions of this statute have been construed as requiring proof by the Government that the defendant not only had knowledge of its stolen character but also that he knew it was stolen from the United States. For example, in a prosecution in the district of New Jersey, in which the indictment charged a violation of the above-quoted provision of law, the court directed a verdict for the defendants on the ground that the evidence failed to show that the defendants knew the property was stolen from the United States. This decision was based upon the ruling of the Supreme Court in Kirby v. United States (174 U. S. 47.) In that case the defendant was charged with feloniously receiving and having in his possession with intent to convert to his own use certain postage stamps which had been stolen from the post office. In the opinion Mr. Justice Harlan held that in order to sustain its charge against Kirby it was incumbent upon the Government to establish beyond a reasonable doubt (1) that the property described in the indictment was, in fact, stolen from the United States; (2) that the defendant received or retained it in his possession with intent to convert it to his own use or gain; and (3) that he received or retained it with knowledge that it had been stolen from the United States.

The necessity of proving that the receiver of stolen Government property knew it was stolen from the United States places an undue burden upon the Government in the enforcement of this statute. By reason of the difficulty encountered in satisfying such requirement, receivers of stolen Government property under some circumstances escape the punishment which should be imposed upon them.

It is, therefore, recommended that the existing law be amended so as to make it sufficient for the prosecution to show that the receiver knew that the property was stolen without being required to prove that he knew that the property had been stolen from the United States. This result may be accomplished by striking out the word "so" immediately preceding the word "embezzled" in the appropriate clause of the statute. A draft of a proposed bill to effectuate the foregoing recommendation is enclosed herewith.

I have been advised by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget that the proposed legislation is in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

TOM C. CLARK,
Attorney General.

AUTHORIZATION FOR SENATE SECTION OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON ATOMIC ENERGY TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE SENATE

Senate section of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy be privileged to sit this afternoon while the Senate is in session, and also on Friday, if necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the order is made.

THE CALENDAR—BILLS PASSED OVER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The routine morning business is closed. The calendar under rule VIII is in order and the clerk will state the bills on the calendar.

The bill (S. 27) to provide for suspending the enforcement of certain obligations against the operators of gold and silver mines who are forced to cease operations because of the war was announced as first in order.

Mr. WHITE. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 1030) to continue in effect certain war excise tax rates and for other purposes was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHITE. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 1353) to amend the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHITE. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

SAN CARLOS IRRIGATION AND DRAINAGE DISTRICT, ARIZONA

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 60) to authorize the San Carlos irrigation and drainage district, Arizona, to drill, equip, and acquire wells for use on the San Carlos irrigation project was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. WHERRY. Reserving the right to object, may we have an explanation of the joint resolution?

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, this joint resolution will permit the San Carlos irrigation and drainage district to drill some 20 wells for water and to deepen about 30 others on the San Carlos project.

The San Carlos irrigation project, Arizona, comprises 100,000 acres of land, 50,000 acres of which are Indian lands and the remaining 50,000 acres in white ownership. When the original bill authorizing the project was passed and the contracts were executed the white owners were compelled to deed all their rights to underground water to the Secretary of the Interior, with the understanding, of course, that the Secretary of the Interior would develop the water for the benefit of the whole project.

There is now an extreme drought in that region, and because of the urgency of the situation the white people are willing to put up the money for the drilling of some additional wells in order to round out the project and make it more complete, so far as the pumping of the water is concerned.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. From what I have read, and from what I have been told, I understand the joint resolution is a measure primarily of local interest.

Mr. McFARLAND. That is correct.

Mr. WHITE. I understand also the joint resolution comes before the Senate with a unanimous and favorable report of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McFARLAND. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to inquire whether there will be any further expense incurred by the Federal Government in connection with the project.

Mr. McFARLAND. The joint resolution provides that the cost of the wells shall be a project charge and shall be repaid in one of two methods. It is estimated the cost will be $380,000, and it will be repaid either by appropriations or, if the Congress does not appropriate the money, the cost will be deducted from future payments due for construction costs of the project.

Mr. WHERRY. As I understand, the total amount involved is something over $350,000.

Mr. McFARLAND. That is correct. The bill limits the expenditure to $380,000.

Mr. WHERRY. And the reason for the legislation at this time is that there is an emergency?

Mr. McFARLAND. That is a fact. There are only about 12,000 acre-feet of water in the Coolidge Dam; and if the water is not obtained immediately, the farmers will not be able to make a crop this year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 60) to authorize the San Carlos irrigation and drainage district, Arizona, to drill, equip, and acquire wells for use on the San Carlos irrigation project, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 2, line 3, after the word "constructed", to strike out "a certain program" and to insert "an extension of the system"; on line 5, after the word "works", to strike out "as a part"; on line 11, after the word "project", to insert "exclusively"; on line 15, after the word "available", to insert the word "exclusively"; on line 18, after the word "purchase", to strike out "or otherwise acquire" and to insert "with the consent of and under agreement with the owner thereof"; on page 3, line 1, after the word "wells", to insert a comma and the words "exclusively for use as part of the common stored and pumped water supply of said project, equipment, and pumping works herein"; on line 20, after the words "authorized to", to strike out "pay such costs" and to insert "make such reimbursement"; on page 4, line 2, before the words "by the district", to insert "under oath"; on line 8, after the word "funds", to insert the word "so", so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be constructed an extension of the system of wells and pumping works of the San Carlos irrigation project, including the enlargement, rehabilitation, and repair of the present pumping and drainage works of the said project, and in order to expedite and assist the accomplishment thereof the San Carlos irrigation and drainage district is hereby authorized, (1) to develop underground water within and without the area of the San Carlos irrigation project exclusively for use as a part of the common stored and pumped water supply of said project; (2) to drill irrigation wells within and without the project area necessary for making underground waters available exclusively for use on all lands of the project, and equip the same with pumping facilities and equipment, including the deepening, replacement, and repair of existing project wells and equipment; and (3) to purchase with the consent of and under agreement with the owner thereof and to develop privately owned wells within or adjacent to the project areas, together with rights-of-way necessary to the operation of such wells: Provided, That the cost of the wells, exclusively for use as part of the common stored and pumped water supply of said project, equipment, and pumping works herein authorized to be constructed or acquired shall not exceed the sum of $380,000 and, within that limit, such cost shall be deemed a project charge to be distributed equally per acre over both the Indian lands and the lands in public and private ownership within the San Carlos irrigation project, and shall be repayable to the United States in accordance with existing law: Provided further, That the Secretary shall, at the earliest practicable date, enter into an agreement with the San Carlos irrigation and drainage district, which agreement shall describe the scope and extent of the work to be done by the district, the plans and specifications therefor, and such other provisions, in conformity herewith, as may be agreed upon between the Secretary and the district: Provided further, That the San Carlos irrigation and drainage district shall be reimbursed for costs expended by it in the construction and acquisition of such wells, equipment, and pumping works; and the Secretary is hereby authorized to make such reimbursement: First, by releasing the district from the payment of construction charges due the United States annually by the district under the repayment contract executed pursuant to said act of June 7, 1924, as amended, as such charges become due and payable, until the amount of the payments so released shall equal the total amount of the funds certified under oath by the district as having been expended by it for the construction and acquisition of wells and equipment under the terms of the agreement provided for herein, the first of such annual payments so to be released by the Secretary being that due from the district on December 1, 1947; or second, by paying to the district the full amount of the funds so certified as expended by it in the work authorized to be done, or any balance thereof not otherwise paid as hereinabove provided, out of appropriations hereafter made by Congress for this purpose; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $380,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the purposes of this joint resolution.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the calendar.

TIME FOR FILING REPORT BY JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE LEGISLATIVE BUDGET

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask that the Joint Committee on the Legislative Budget, created pursuant to the provisions of section 138 (a) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, have until midnight Saturday, February 15, to file a report of the joint committee as required by section 138 (a), even though the Senate may not be in session on Saturday, February 15.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

SAFEGUARDING OF PUBLIC RECORDS AND PAPERS

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, recently we witnessed the refreshing spectacle of a government aroused at last over the flagrant abuse of a public trust. I refer to the growing indignation over the pernicious practice whereby public officials carry away public records for their own use and profit.

The practice of removing public records has increased enormously in recent years. The bad example was set by the highest officials charged with the conduct of public business, and it has been followed by many others at the lower levels. Scholars and historians of the future who desire to obtain source material will be compelled to travel to the Roosevelt collection, to the Stimson, Hopkins, Ickes, and Morgenthau collections, and goodness knows how many other collections, although all or a large part of such papers concern official business of the United States and belong in a single place, the Archives of the United States.

The prevalence of this practice compels speculation on the motives for removing these records. Sometimes there is a sinister motive such as the desire to doctor or obliterate embarrassing or incriminating evidence. Those who have lived through the last 14 years know how widespread was the twisting of words and the resort to schemes to color official performances. From my experiences on the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program and on the Joint Committee To Investigate the Pearl Harbor Attack, I know that in innumerable instances a missing file here or an incomplete file there makes a good deal of difference. On many occasions I was informed that efforts were being made to remove or to destroy records because such records might prove embarrassing. One of these concerned the so-called loyalty files of the Civil Service Commission. Another bore upon similar records in the War Department. A third case dealt with certain contract transactions of private firms with the Rubber Reserve Corporation.

Some of these cases rested on nothing more substantial than unfounded rumor, and a simple inquiry disposed of them. In other cases there was good ground to suspect the destruction of files and only our vigilance preserved them. In the main, cases of public records being taken for sinister motives are relatively few; and rarely is this method successful in warding off embarrassment or an accounting for unconscionable transactions.

The greater number of instances of public records being removed are not based on sinister motives. They rest chiefly on a bad rash of hyperegotism which infected the higher levels of official life in the last 14 years.

Many of our officials have become so conceited over their part in the drama of events that they cannot resist the temptation to take all of the scripts with them when they leave the public stage.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. Does the able Senator from Michigan suggest that the practice of officials removing what have been considered perhaps in the past as their private papers from governmental offices began only 14 years ago?

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I answer by saying that I shall cover that question later on in what I have to say.

The officials who are removing such files want the self-pleasure of telling the "inside story" of historic events, particularly their great part in them. They want to walk in the public spotlight long after they have been otherwise consigned to obscurity. They are intoxicated by the joyful anticipation of making revelations in the "now-it-can-be-told" manner.

Some of them even believe they can gain special prestige by the publication of memoirs if they can spice them with a few tidbits of history salvaged from hitherto unrevealed records. Some of them harbor more grandiose schemes of creating shrines with the public records they remove so that their names will receive perpetual homage from scholars who will be forced to undertake special pilgrimages in order to learn details of the country's history. Others use the public records to blow the horn of self-glorification loud enough to make certain that its echo will reverberate far down the halls of time.

Mr. PEPPER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. Not at the present moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. A few consider their public service and the records they take away with them as an investment yielding cash dividends from published articles, books, and collected papers.

Invariably those who abuse the public trust display the common weaknesses of gall and avarice. They grow bolder and bolder until at last one or more of them exceeds the bounds of tolerance in an easy-going government, and a storm of public indignation is aroused.

This is what happened in recent weeks when the former Secretary of the Treasury, Henry Morgenthau, Jr., was reported to have removed some 900 volumes of recorded material dealing with public business transacted during the period he held office.

We do not need to know the exact content of this material to reach the simple conclusion that it must contain many public documents and records. The sheer bulk of the haul indicates inclusion of a great deal more than the casual jottings of a busy public official. Some 900 volumes—not pages or papers, but volumes—of memoranda, photostats, correspondence, reports and transcripts of conferences can hardly be classed as fragmentary data ordinarily used to refresh a weak memory. Nor is it possible to conceive how an official so busy with public affairs as was Mr. Morgenthau could find time to accumulate 900 volumes of purely personal data. Even Colonel House, who had plenty of time unburdened by the cares of public office, and who kept a methodical diary for a great many years in the stirring times of Woodrow Wilson, barely squeezed out two volumes of data and reminiscences.

The Morgenthau material, so far as we know, is exceeded only by the boxcars of public papers said to have been removed by Franklin D. Roosevelt to the self-created shrine at Hyde Park. Among the latter are papers over which his secretary, Miss Grace Tully, held the power of final determination as to their relevancy to an inquiry by a congressional committee on the causes of the Pearl Harbor disaster. I thought at the time, and still think, such a situation is a fraud upon the people who have a paramount right to the documentary evidence of their Nation's history. In passing upon this case as well as others, we have been far too lenient with those who appropriate public property, and undoubtedly, the bulk of these records constitutes such property.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator from Michigan has called attention to the case of the former Secretary of the Treasury. Does the Senator have any information as to whether the files or the documents which were removed were of the nature of public documents?

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I shall have to answer that question by stating, as I have stated before, that up to the present time, I do not have personal knowledge except with respect to the large volume of papers removed, and what has been said in the press and by the present Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Snyder, as to their contents.

Mr. BREWSTER. From the Senator's study of the question up to this time is there a clear distinction between public records, and private records which are the property of the individual?

Mr. FERGUSON. The line of demarcation between what is a personal record and what is a public record is somewhat blurred, it is not clear cut.

Mr. BREWSTER. If any of the records removed were public documents, then was it not clearly a violation of law for any official, however high his position, to remove them? If they were not public records, but simply personal or private records, then it would not be the concern of the Government or of any official what was done with them. Does that distinction cover the situation?

Mr. FERGUSON. If they were public records there is ample law on the statute books today to take care of the situation.

Mr. BREWSTER. Either as to removal or destruction?

Mr. FERGUSON. Either as to removal or destruction.

Mr. BREWSTER. Under the statute providing a fine of $2,000 and imprisonment for 3 years, or both?

Mr. FERGUSON. As I recall, that is the penalty. I shall deal with that subject later.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; I am glad to yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know, of course, what records Mr. Morgenthau removed. It is a little difficult to understand how any man in any busy job could write a diary of 900 volumes.

Mr. FERGUSON. A personal diary, I think the Senator has in mind.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes, a personal diary of 900 volumes. He may, however, have written such a diary. I do not question that at all, because I do not know. It simply strikes me as a good deal of literature to be turned out in the busy life of a man.

It is one thing to keep personal files of personal matters. I suppose, also, there would be no objection to a highly placed official making copies of certain files in his office for his own use later if he wished to use them to write a book about matters which transpired while he was in office. But I cannot conceive that any public officer would remove official files. I do not know whether a letter written to the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of Agriculture and a carbon copy of the answer to such letter would always necessarily be regarded as public documents. Probably they would be.

Mr. FERGUSON. If the letters related to the public business they would be public documents.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course the same thing might apply to a Senator. What documents in our offices are public documents? We receive letters dealing with all kinds of public matters, legislation, appointments, and other matters, and we answer the letters. Are they public documents or are they personal files which we can remove when we leave the Senate? A good many Senators have written diaries or memoirs, as have many Members of the other House. James G. Blaine, Thomas H. Benton, Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, John Quincy Adams, Champ Clark, and the late leader of the Republican Party in the Senate, the Honorable James E. Watson, who I am glad to say is still among us, wrote diaries or books based upon their official records and events and incidents with which they came in contact. It is difficult to draw the line between what is a public document and what is not a public document. I suppose probably the distinction would be more blurred with respect to a Member of the Senate than it would be with respect to a Cabinet officer.

Mr. FERGUSON. I take it for granted that it would be.

Mr. BARKLEY. Although I dare say a good many files within our own offices are purely public documents in the sense that they may represent some action or some opinion or some correspondence between us and other people in regard to legislation pending in the Senate.

Mr. FERGUSON. Certainly, letters or documents growing out of the work of a committee would be official public documents.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. I cannot imagine that the Senate would want to clutter up its records with all the correspondence which a Senator receives and replies to, or even all the memoranda he makes in connection with committee work; so it is rather difficult to draw the line.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, we have a method of disposing of such files.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand. That method, however, and the law itself, may not apply to Members of the Congress as strictly as it does to executive officers.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. I am glad the Senator from Kentucky made the point he did, as I think the law regarding the removal or destruction of public records applies to the executive departments, and has never been construed as applying to the records of a Senator or a Member of the other House.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that. Yet from the standpoint of analogy it is within the range of possibility that there might be found in a Senator's office an official record which is just as important, if not more important, than some of the official records to be found in an executive department.

Mr. BREWSTER. An interesting question may be presented upon which I think it would be helpful to have the reaction of the minority leader. Suppose the minority leader had telephoned the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, regarding official business pending in the Senate. It is my understanding that records of most such conversations were kept and constitute some of the records included among those taken away by the former Secretary. I ask the Senator from Kentucky whether such telephone records would be considered in any sense as official or public records. It presents an interesting question.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes, it does. There is no law requiring that a conversation over the telephone with an executive officer be taken down.

Mr. BREWSTER. No.

Mr. BARKLEY. And as a matter of fairness to the Member of the Senate or the Member of the House or anyone else, he ought to know that his conversation is being taken down; but I would be willing to wager my head against the hole in a doughnut that not one out of a thousand conversations so held was ever within the knowledge of anyone outside the executive departments known to be taken down or a record being made of it.

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator from Kentucky means that the Senator at one end of the line was not apprised of the fact that the conversation was being taken down?

Mr. BARKLEY. He was not apprised of the fact that his conversation was being taken down. No one but the one at the receiving end of the call knew anything about that.

Mr. BREWSTER. I understand the Senator from Kentucky does not approve of that practice?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not. I think it is——

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator from Michigan will indulge me a moment further, let me say that if such a practice is to be indulged in, whether the individual at this end of the line is a Senator or a Member of the House or a private citizen, he ought to be notified as soon as the conversation begins that what he is saying is being taken down so that he will know the fact, and he is entitled to a copy of it if he wants it, after the conversation is concluded.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, in reply to that statement, let me say that there is no law on the statute books which provides that public officials must keep records. They can do business out of their hats if they desire. But the law states that after they make records, including records of telephone conversations, such records must be preserved as public records, and not be destroyed except in compliance with law.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let me ask the Senator from Michigan this question: Would he construe a typewritten copy of a conversation over the telephone, taken by a stenographer and afterward transcribed, as a public document? Would it be one that the secretary, for instance, would have to keep in the files, or could he fold it up and stick it in his pocket?

Mr. FERGUSON. I should say that it would be a public document and should remain in the files, because it would have to do with public business?

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand the Senator does not know what type of documents, if any, which could be construed as public documents, were removed by Secretary Morgenthau or any other official?

Mr. FERGUSON. That is correct. But I am going to suggest that we find out what has been removed. There can be no doubt that some of these papers are private. For instance, I read in last night's newspaper that a part of the collection taken from the White House consisted of letters addressed to Fala, the small Scotty, which belonged to the President. I do not think anyone would contend that such letters were public papers, because Fala was not a public official. Some private papers were removed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan further yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Fala may not have been a public official, but he was treated by some of the critics and opponents of the late President Roosevelt as though he were a high-ranking officer.

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes. As I remember, another dog was transported in place of certain public officials. We can hardly blame the people for feeling that the dogs were public officials.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator is discussing a rather serious question, one which I think our committee is presently taking up, and upon which it will hold an open session.

Mr. FERGUSON. That is correct.

Mr. HATCH. It is a matter of concern as to what are public records, and how they should be preserved. Has there been any clear definition of public records, and is the line of demarcation between private documents and public records clearly defined?

Mr. FERGUSON. It has not been. I shall discuss that question, and I believe I can show the Senate what is a public document and what is a private document.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. The penal statute referred to by my colleague [Mr. BREWSTER] and also by the Senator from Michigan should be in such terms that one could understand what is a crime and what is not a crime. I am interested to know whether there is in any court decision or any statutory language a definition of what constitutes a public record. Or has a penal statute been enacted without an attempt to define the crime?

Mr. FERGUSON. Let me put it this way: A penal statute has been enacted, but apparently never used. That is why we cannot point to decisions.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The penal statute itself does not clearly define what a public document or record is.

Mr. FERGUSON. That is correct. It does not say what a public record is.

Mr. BARKLEY. We can understand that an entry made in a book at the time a transaction took place, or shortly thereafter, is a record. In some cases it is necessary to make such an entry in order that the action taken may be legal. Such an entry would undoubtedly be a record. No one would have a right to remove it. However, if in connection with some transaction an officer makes a memorandum to refresh his own recollection, or for his own use, I doubt whether that is a public record within the meaning of the law.

Mr. FERGUSON. Take the case in which the War Department had in mind the destruction of all bids except the bids acted upon and pursuant to which contracts were let. It is clear to me that a bid for a contract is a public record. Again, consider the files in the War Department relating to subversive activities. They have been removed from the War Department. They seem to the Senator from Michigan to be public records. They should not be destroyed. They should not be removed from the files by anyone. They should not be destroyed or disposed of except in compliance with the law.

Mr. CORDON and Mr. PEPPER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield first to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CORDON. There has been some discussion here, and I have read considerable in the press, with reference to the so-called diary of a recent Secretary of the Treasury, and whether there may be some public interest in that document. According to the press, the series of volumes contains approximately 60,000,000 words.

Mr. FERGUSON. There are 900 volumes.

Mr. CORDON. The gentleman who wrote the diary would require at least 4 years to dictate it, at the rate of 120 words a minute and on the basis of a 40-hour week. It would require 6 more years for a stenographer to transcribe it. It occurs to me that perhaps the Government might have some slight interest in the subject, if only from the standpoint of cost.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. I am somewhat at a loss to reconcile the attack which is being made here today by the Senator from Michigan and the remarks relative to the removal of some papers by the late President Roosevelt and by Mr. Morgenthau, with the knowledge that yesterday afternoon the committee resolved, in a proper way, to go into the whole question, to try to find out what the law is, what the facts are, whether any wrong has been done, and, if so, what retribution should be visited upon those who have done wrong. The able Senator from Michigan, a former distinguished jurist, is a member of the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program. Knowing that the committee resolved yesterday afternon to take such action, the Senator from Michigan chooses to make a speech on the subject today in the Senate. I wonder if that course is calculated to inspire public confidence in the fairness and impartiality of the investigations of the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program. I wonder whether this is really an inquiry into what the facts are, and a determination of whether or not the law has been violated, or whether the real design and intent of this inquiry in the Senate is to make political capital of some sort out of Democrats following a practice which was engaged in by Abraham Lincoln. I wonder if the Senator from Michigan intended, when he spoke about the egotism of public officials who remove public records from their offices, to include a reference to the Lincoln papers, which are to be opened this year, and which have not as yet been made public.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator from Florida for a question. I shall be glad to answer his question.

The jurisdiction of the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program has been reduced to the simple question of war contracts. I am not limiting my discussion today to that field. I am discussing the broad question of the wholesale removal of papers from the public records.

I am glad that the able Senator from Florida raised the question with respect to Abraham Lincoln. Abraham Lincoln removed no papers from the public files. Lincoln died suddenly while in office, and the papers were removed by his executors and not by Abraham Lincoln. I am glad the Senator from Florida raised the point. We are talking about records which are removed from the public files.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I must decline to yield until I finish what I have to say. Then I shall be glad to yield for a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves this point will he yield for one question?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the able Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator from Michigan has just made a statement about the jurisdiction of the committee. I ask the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. BREWSTER] if he agrees with the statement just made by the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I did not mean to imply that my statement was binding upon the chairman. However, the jurisdiction of the committee relates to war contracts. I am sure that nothing I may have said would narrow the jurisdiction of the committee. The point I was trying to make was that the Senate had limited the jurisdiction of the committee. Its jurisdiction certainly would not include the 900 volumes removed by Mr. Morgenthau unless they related in some way to war contracts.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from Maine because he may wish to reply.

Mr. BREWSTER. I should like to reply briefly to the suggestion which has been made. I think I have very much in mind what the Senator from New Mexico means. I assume that the language of the Senator from Maine referring to contracts is sufficiently all-inclusive to cover inefficiency, waste, extravagance, or other questions involved in the system of letting contracts. With that understanding, I think there is no difficulty regarding the terminology he has used. If the documents removed by Secretary Morgenthau related to the Treasury procurement program which operated under lend-lease, that is a subject with which our committee would be very seriously concerned. We are concerned with the general conduct of the program for procurement of war supplies, in the aspects which I have indicated.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator be kind enough to yield for one observation?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. There is perhaps a serious difference of opinion in our committee concerning its jurisdiction and concerning the effect of the limitation upon its jurisdiction which was adopted when the life of the committee was extended. I think such a question should be resolved, and I am happy to have expressions from two distinguished members of the committee who belong to the majority party.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, the language of the Senator from Michigan certainly is intended to cover the broad field of contracts and everything in relation to the war effort which properly comes within the purview of the resolution.

Mr. President, the logic of the situation, unless clearly disproved by a thorough inspection of the Morgenthau collection, shows that Mr. Morgenthau carried off a large amount of public records. This is all the more reprehensible because, as I shall show later, Mr. Morgenthau is one of the classes of officers in whom discretion and trust is placed to determine what records are to be preserved or destroyed. It makes no difference whether these are original records or systematic reproductions collected with the help of Government personnel and equipment; the breach of public trust for private gain is the same.

This is so obviously the case that two of our highest officials have expressed themselves publicly as a result of the incident. By the way, to those who have suggested that this inquiry may be partisan, I reply that these public officials were members of the Democratic Party.

In an official statement, John W. Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury, called upon his predecessor, Mr. Morgenthau, to return to the Treasury Department the voluminous records which Mr. Morgenthau took when he left office.

I have no doubt—

Said Mr. Snyder—

either that the material comprising the diary is in major part, at least, public property or that Mr. Morgenthau will so view the matter on reflection.

Apparently Mr. Morgenthau has not seen fit to reflect, and, up to date, has not returned the property to the Treasury or to the United States Government Archives.

As Secretary of the Treasury Mr. Snyder is well placed to know the character and volume of public papers removed by Mr. Morgenthau. His public request for a return of this material indicates careful consideration of the matter and a conviction that public property has been removed. The people owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Snyder for his courage in moving at this time to put a stop to the private capitalization of public office. The Morgenthau case is no more reprehensible than many other similar cases; it is merely the latest in the pernicious practices of many public officials whose lack of integrity despoils the public archives.

While Mr. Snyder, as Mr. Morgenthau's successor in the Treasury Department, is perhaps an appropriate official to take action in this case, we have further condemnation of this practice from an even higher source. On the day following Mr. Snyder's demand for the return of the Morgenthau material, White House correspondents reported that President Truman was considering methods of safeguarding the integrity of official files and prescribing the uses to which documents are to be put. I hope we shall hear from the President when those who are studying the problem for him are ready to report. Far too often misconduct in public office is quietly shelved after mild censure as the onrush of new events dims the public memory.

Meanwhile there are some observations which a Member of Congress might make from his own experience. I am well aware that history abounds with instances of public officials who have taken papers with them on withdrawal from the public service. Every history text is bolstered with prolific citations to the memoirs and collected papers of public men. Many libraries are the repositories of famous collections of such papers. Whole bibliographies are made up of items identifying these collections, cataloging what they contain, and stating their locations. So the practice we are discussing is by no means new.

But a study of these sources of data reveals some differences between past and current practices. The documentary riches of public men of the past consist mainly of personal recollections of their participation in events appearing in the form of original memoirs written by them. The documentary material back of these memoirs was strictly personal in the true sense of the word. They were really personal diaries, books of account, scribbled notes and memoranda, letter-press copies of personal letters and original replies, and, at the most, some scattered copies of state papers in the public archives. With some exceptions, almost all of it was intimate material and fairly modest in amount. It was not a reproduction of official records, made on Government time, with personnel on public pay rolls, and with Government photographic and recording equipment. It was not carried away in the historical equivalent of trucks and boxcars.

In the proper sense it was not the public records which earlier statesmen took with them on leaving public office, but the personal memorabilia which supplemented and enriched the public records by the added light shed on men and events. Very little of it was used by earlier statesmen in self-glorification or for personal profit. Indeed, such glorification as they achieved has come to most of them posthumously as the patient work of scholars and the passage of time revealed the significance of their lives. Most of the pecuniary profit—what little there was—accrued to their descendants and heirs.

Some modern statesmen seem to have a desire to foreclose their place in history in advance and to cash in before they die, even if it means a breach in the integrity of the public records of the United States of America.

I admit there are occasions where the line between the public business and the private affairs is blurred. The public official himself must often be the judge of where the line should be drawn. But I submit that the distinction between public and private is not so difficult to draw that an official with a high sense of ethics needs make more than a few trivial mistakes. Certainly the mistake will not run to 900 volumes or to an amount of material that would fill a boxcar. Where there is the slightest doubt whether records and papers are public or private, an official of integrity will always resolve it in the public interest, and will declare that they are public records to be preserved for the benefit of the public welfare. He will remind himself that when he voluntarily undertook to serve the people in an official capacity his daily acts became clothed with a public interest, which personal honor and propriety recognize as paramount. What he takes on leaving office—if vanity does not intervene—will be truly personal effects, narrowly construed.

Good public men are aware of the significance of public records. Each one knows that his own life and times are but brief moments in the infinite span of historical time. Each one knows that the present is the inheritor of the rich accumulations of the past. Each one seeks his utmost to light his path with the lamp of experience, which is history. Countless hours are spent in threshing over materials of the past in hope of distilling a drop of wisdom useful in the present. Today's generation is enriched, strengthened, and guided by what it knows of countless generations before it, or impoverished by what has been forever lost because it had been improperly preserved.

Public records make up the backbone of history. All men with a deep sense of the historical know this to be so. Men of integrity are diligent in their efforts to see that the public records are as complete as possible, scrupulously safeguarded, and properly preserved where the people may have ready access to them. That is the real significance of public museums, libraries, and Government archives.

We have had a long succession of laws specifically designed to protect and to preserve official papers. The latest of these is the act concerning the disposal of records, approved July 7, 1943, as amended July 6, 1945 (57 Stat. 380–383; 59 Stat. 434). It dovetails with and complements the act to establish a National Archives of the United States Government, approved June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. p. 1122).

As I examine these laws, I am impressed with their complete command of the subject, and it is difficult for me to look beyond them for new legislation to handle any of the cases we have been discussing. What is sorely needed, in my estimation, is the forthright enforcement of the present laws in the public interest.

The 1943 act defines records to include—and this will help us to determine what are records—

All books, papers, maps, photographs, or other documentary materials, regardless of physical form or characteristics, made or received by any agency of the United States Government in pursuance of Federal law or in connection with the transaction of public business and preserved or appropriate for preservation by that agency or its legitimate successor as evidence of the organization, functions, policies, decisions, procedures, operations, or other activities of the Government or because of the informational value of data contained therein.

While the law does not mention the records made by individuals in the course of the public business, it would be a farcical presumption for us to exclude them, since it is obvious that records do not appear by spirit writing, but at the hands of individuals in charge of Government agencies and conducting the public business.

After defining public records, the law then proceeds to charge the National Archives Council and the Archivist with the duty of preparing regulations for the disposal of records and of carrying out procedures for the preservation of records.

The National Archives Council charged with making such regulations was to be composed of the Secretaries of each of the executive departments or their alternates the chairman of House and Senate Committees on the Library, the Librarian of Congress, the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, and the Archivist of the United States. I hold in my hand a rather elaborate manual for Federal officials on the subject How To Dispose of Records, as promulgated by this Council.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Under the definition which is contained in that manual, let us consider the case of a Cabinet officer who, following the close of a conference on public business with other Cabinet officers, goes to his office and dictates to a Government employee a record of the conversations carried on and the conclusions reached, whereupon the notes of the dictation are transcribed by the employee on Government time and the transcript is preserved in the Cabinet officer's public office for his future information. Would that be such a record as is outlined in the manual?

Mr. FERGUSON. I have no doubt that that would be such a record as is contemplated by the manual to which I have referred, because it would be one of the records upon which the official acted; it would be a part of the policy formulated by the Government. Although the Government officer is not officially required to make such a record, for, as I said before, he could do his business out of his hat, yet when he does make it it is just like the record of a court or the opinion handed down by a judge in a court. I may say that the acts to which I have referred apply to courts as well as to executive agencies. When a judge dictates an opinion it then becomes a part of the official file, and it should remain so.

Otherwise we could not trace the history of the United States; we could not determine what caused a certain Cabinet officer to act as he did. The official record indicates that he acted, for instance, because his fellow Cabinet officers decided upon a certain path, a certain road, and a certain goal.

If the officer were to remove the record and subsequently were to become a witness as to what the record contained, as we all know in court proceedings the destruction of a record always is presumed to indicate that it would speak the truth if it were available, and that a witness' contradition of what was stated in the document should not be considered.

Mr. President, let us consider merely the opening lines of the manual to which I have referred. It declares:

Records produced, received, and maintained in the course of operations of agencies of the Federal Government are the property of the Government and can ordinarily be disposed of only after authorization has been obtained from Congress.

There are exceptions, which I shall cover later. Without going into detail, the procedure for disposing of records is as follows. The agency head submits lists or schedules of records to be disposed of to the Archivist, who is charged with the responsibility of appraising the records. His power in this respect is also defined in the National Archives Act, as follows:

SEC. 3. All archives or records belonging to the Government of the United States (legislative, executive, judicial, and other) shall be under the charge and superintendence of the Archivist to this extent: he shall have full power to inspect personally or by deputy the records of any agency * * * whatsoever and wheresoever located, and shall have the full cooperation of any and all persons in charge of such records in such inspections, and to requisition for transfer to the National Archives Establishment such archives, or records as the National Archives Council * * * shall approve for such transfer.

The head of a Government department or agency may exempt records from inspection or from the disposal process if the material is deemed by him to be confidential, but only for limited periods, and not exceeding in duration his tenure of that office. The law says nothing about his taking records with him.

From time to time, as he deems expedient, the Archivist submits lists of records to a joint committee of Senate and House Members. If after examination the records are found to be without value, they are ordered to be disposed of, and specific methods of disposition are prescribed.

Where certain classes of records have been evaluated and found to be of no value, a general order may be given to the agency head to dispose periodically of all recurring records of the same form. Under this provision records are being disposed of constantly as a simple matter of course, but the process is carefully guarded. Furthermore, in certain kinds of emergencies, as when military necessity or danger to human life or health or property is involved, the Archivist or agency head may take summary action with regard to records, but all such actions must thereafter be reported.

Throughout these laws there are certain grants of discretion to agency heads, to the Archivist and to others, with respect to the disposal of records; but in the final analysis records must either be disposed of in strict conformity with this disposal law or left in the agency indefinitely. There is not the slightest authority to the agency heads to cart away records in any form on their own. Why have this elaborate procedure, why safeguard it so carefully, if an agency head may thwart it merely upon his own caprice? On the contrary, the disposal manual states that "the files of policy-determining officials are of special significance and should always be preserved." I presume this cuts quite close to the papers removed by Mr. Morgenthau, and possibly by Harry Hopkins, Harold Ickes, and Mr. Stimson, all of whom were very close to policy making.

We who served on the Pearl Harbor Joint Committee were allowed to have certain parts of Mr. Stimson's diary, and the record showed clearly that at times it was dictated to a dictaphone and transcribed by a stenographer working for the United States Government, but the members of the joint committee of the two Houses were not permitted to see the diary. No; the public official was allowed to remove it, and to this day we have gotten only what that public official wanted to give us.

If records are disposed for waste paper, they "must first be macerated or otherwise treated to destroy their record content or the contract for their sale must include a clause prohibiting their resale as records or documents."

Records may be transferred to certain public or private institutions, where they may serve the general public interest in certain cases.

Mr. President, I say now that when a public official ceases to be a public official he should have no right to the public documents which have accumulated in his office. As is indicated in this manual, if records are sold, the contract must include a clause prohibiting their resale as records or documents. The same rule would apply to a public official the day or the hour or the minute following his retirement from the Government service.

Application must be made for documents sought for institutions where they may serve the general public interest, and the agency concerned may pass upon such an application. But in every case of this kind the records "cannot be transferred without the approval of the Archivist." That regulation is on page 22 of the pamphlet. The regulations further provide "This method of disposal is desirable in rare cases," but it "should not, of course, be employed for records containing confidential information." That refers to what I have heretofore stated, that records may be transferred to certain public or private institutions where they may serve the general public in certain cases.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. In connection with the records regarding Secretary Stimson, of which the Senator speaks, and the events transpiring in the month of November before the Pearl Harbor attack, and the discussions with various officials concerning which inquiry was made of the Secretary of War, from the Senator's experience as a judge and as a member of the committee, how would he evaluate a record made at a particular time by the Cabinet officer regarding the conversations and the conclusion in the conferences, as against the later recollection of the Cabinet officer after a period of 5 years?

Mr. FERGUSON. I should be compelled to say, as the law clearly indicates, that the best evidence is the record made at the time.

Mr. BREWSTER. That, is it not, is a principle well established in law?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; it is a principle well established in law.

Mr. BREWSTER. If the official in testifying at the later time elected to take the records to refresh his recollection, but refused to permit the tribunal to examine the records, how would that be considered in any court?

Mr. FERGUSON. The court would cast great doubt on the testimony, and should so charge the jury, if there were a jury.

Mr. BREWSTER. Would not any court necessarily order the production of a document which had been used for purposes of refreshment, and have it presented to the court as an essential document, for cross-examination?

Mr. FERGUSON. That is the practice, and the law is that a man cannot give verbally his idea of what is in a record made as of a certain time, because the record itself is the best evidence. We could not apply that rule in the Pearl Harbor hearing because the man who had the record and was testifying was not a plaintiff or a defendant, and it was contended that the disclosure would harm not him but the Government of the United States. That is why the committee had to take what it could get from public officials without recourse to the record itself.

Mr. BREWSTER. Is there not a clearly established doctrine in law referring to what is known as past recollection recorded?

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BREWSTER. As distinct from the use of memoranda for refreshment, if they do not take on a character which would sufficiently authenticate them?

Mr. FERGUSON. That is correct.

Mr. BREWSTER. The records made by the Secretary daily following conferences would have a higher responsibility or import, would they not?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; records taken as of given dates are in law considered as speaking the truth.

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, even after the records are authorized for disposal—

> Their transfer will normally be approved except that records will not be approved for transfer (a) if they contain information the revelation of which would be contrary to the public interest or is prohibited by law; (b) to a foreign government unless it has a legitimate interest in them; or (c) to a private individual or business corporation unless they are necessary to the operation of properties transferred by the Government to the individual or corporation.

I cite regulations, page 22.

Now the upshot of all the carefully designed law and regulations is that records not disposed of through these procedures must remain in the department or agency through whose operations the books, papers, maps, photographs, or other documentary material in question came into being. Indeed, the law itself is specific on this point, because in section 15 of the 1943 act it is stated:

> The procedures herein prescribed are exclusive and no records of the United States Government shall be alienated or destroyed except in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Federal law goes much further than the mere provisions against alienation contrary to the law for disposal of records. It provides for criminal penalties against anyone disposing of records other than through prescribed channels. The section most applicable to the subject matter under discussion reads:

> Whoever, having custody of any record, proceeding, map, book, document, paper, or other thing specified in section 234 of this title, shall willfully and unlawfully conceal, remove, mutilate, obliterate, falsify, or destroy any such record, proceeding, map, book, document, paper, or thing, shall be fined not more than $2,000, or imprisoned not more than 3 years, or both; and shall, moreover, forfeit his office and be forever afterward disqualified from holding any office under the Government of the United States (U. S. C., title 18, secs. 234, 235) (35 Stat. 1111–1112, Mar. 4, 1909, ch. 321, No. 128).

Not only does it provide a penalty, it provides that he shall, moreover, forfeit his office and be forever afterward disqualified from holding any office under the Government of the United States. It is obvious from all this that it is not intended that the United States must stand by helpless while public officials carry away records on the simple assertion that they are "personal files." If such an assertion were the sole criterion, the law would be farcical. It would be possible for every official to despoil the public archives by his own caprice.

When a man takes public office his acts and conduct in the course of his operations in such office are presumed to be those of the public official, not the private individual. The papers, correspondence, memoranda, and other records generated by him in that office, with the personnel on the public pay roll, and with Government equipment, are prima facie presumed to be the records and the property of the United States Government.

Mr. President, the burden is on the public official to prove conclusively and specifically to the Archivist of the United States that records he wishes to carry away are in fact his own personal records and do not appertain to the public business.

I do not find that Mr. Morgenthau or any of the other persons who may be involved ever took such records to the Archivist and had him determine, after submission of them to the congressional committees that are authorized to determine such a fact, that they were private papers. No; the papers in question are removed from the office of the retiring official without complying with the law.

The official cannot discharge his duty by the mere assertion that so and so many filing cases, or that some 900 volumes, are "his personal property." I think he has to prove it by calling upon the Archivist to inspect the material and certify to its personal character.

Correspondingly, I contend the Archivist has the power and duty of demanding the return of records removed in any other manner than the one officially prescribed by law. I contend further that the Archivist has the right to call upon the Attorney General of the United States to assist him in making recovery, or in prosecuting individuals who unlawfully remove records from Government agencies and repositories. I think Mr. Snyder acted correctly and properly in first demanding the return of the Morgenthau material, and unless he gets it back promptly, the Archivist and the Attorney General might well take appropriate action.

As I understand, the material is now being examined by a magazine editor or writer to ascertain how it may be used in the future. How can the Members of the Congress and the people of the United States generally know that what may be published presents a true picture of the public records which have been taken rather than a distortion? How can they know that sentences here and there have been used while others have been omitted? The records and papers should be returned to the Archives of the United States, where they are subject to the scrutiny of scholars, historians, and—yes—the Members of the Senate, and of all the people of the United States.

I hope the time is at last at hand when we shall hold public officials to a stricter moral code than has prevailed during the past 14 years. For whether men in public office may play fast and loose with the records and history of the country is above all a moral question. It is common knowledge that loose morals in this respect have been indulged. In a recent column of the New York Times Arthur Krock observed that Mr. Morgenthau "has only been following custom"; and he goes on to say what we have all known:

> Yet the custom grew into estimation as a privilege during the Roosevelt administrations. Not only after they left office, but while still on the public pay roll, members of that administration wrote books and articles for pay, and for the benefit of selected publishers, in which they disclosed facts about public matters acquired only because they were public servants. Favored friends and members of the White House family did very well commercially with similar material, with more to come. (January 30, 1947.)

A sizable bibliography could be compiled merely from these publications by individuals on the public pay roll and presumably devoting themselves to public business. The leading example, in all probability, would be the publication of the public papers and addresses of the former President himself.

I have given considerable study to this question with a view to determining whether or not legislation is needed. In my judgment, at this stage it does not appear that legislation is needed to prevent the removal or destruction of public documents. I have cited the criminal statute which has been on the books for nearly 100 years, and I have cited the statute of 1943 creating a procedure for the destruction of Government documents.

It is true that both statutes involve the use of broad language, and Congress might do well to define the policy with greater exactness by amendment of these two statutes.

But, Mr. President, we should always try to enforce the laws we have. For the Department of Justice and the administration always to be saying "We need a new law" is utterly absurd. Let us try to make use of the laws already available and determine whether they are or are not adequate before we proceed to clutter up the statute books with more laws.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I wish to say that I agree with the Senator respecting the enforcement of existing law; but I ask him if he does not think, from the study he has made, that it might be wise for the Congress itself to clarify the situation by making more clear and certain what is a public record?

Mr. FERGUSON. I doubt whether it would be possible to make it more clear than it has been made in the existing statute. After Congress had more clearly defined the words "public document" or "public record" it would be obliged to depend upon those charged with enforcing the law to examine any documents or records which might be removed. To date the difficulty has been that we have had no supervision over the removal of such material. If disinterested persons had been given the right to examine the papers before they were removed from the Government files I would not be making the statement I am now making.

Let us consider the papers which were in the Archives. We were told during the Pearl Harbor hearings that papers were there in bales. As I understand, a bale represents a great mass of papers. It does not represent simply a drawer full or a filing cabinet full. The Archives contained material brought there from the White House in bales. I am satisfied that all this was not entirely personal material. I can cite some instances. For example, our Government received messages from Mr. Churchill and from the British Government; yet to this day we have never seen replies to those messages. It seems unusual that in the critical days before Pearl Harbor the Government of the United States should receive from the highest official of a foreign government, such as England, a message concerning a very important matter and fail to reply to it. I may say that the committee was never allowed really to ascertain whether such a message received a reply. We had to go to an employee of the executor of the estate of the President and ask her whether a certain paper was in the withdrawn file, and then she would look in the file and determine whether the paper was there.

Mr. President, appropriate language could be added to the two statutes in question only after considerable study of the subject. I, for one, hope the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments will ascertain, through an investigation, what papers or records have been removed, and, in order to discover what has been removed, they ought to see the papers for themselves and not simply take the word of those who removed them. In my judgment, the present terms of the statutes are satisfactory if they are sympathetically enforced by the administrative agents responsible for carrying them out.

The language in the criminal statute to which I have referred, which is the critical language, is as follows:

> Filed or deposited with any clerk or officer of any court of the United States or in any public office or with any judicial or public officer of the United States.

It is the interpretation of this phrase by which the line is drawn between personal and private documents of a public officer and public documents, the destruction or removal of which is prohibited by the criminal statute.

Mr. President, we could add nothing to these criminal statutes that would apply to anyone who has removed any public papers, because it would be an ex post facto law, and clearly void. We could look into the future and take care of what may be done in the future. But what I think needs to be done now is to secure the return, through action of the Attorney General and the Archivist, of the papers which have already been removed, and those officials should determine whether the papers in question are private or public papers.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. TAYLOR. I understand the Senator's presentation is not that of the Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program, but only the Senator's personal views on the matter.

Mr. FERGUSON. That is correct.

Mr. TAYLOR. The statement which the Senator is making has not been authorized by the committee?

Mr. FERGUSON. I do not believe the committee has ever authorized any member to make a speech upon the floor of the Senate. I am not indicating that I am now speaking for the committee. The committee will go into this question; but the scope of the committee's authority is very much limited in connection with the removal of papers.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, there has been considerable discussion on the floor of the Senate about the use of Government facilities in connection with dictating notes and one thing and another, and then Senators making private use of such documents later on. May I ask the distinguished Senator from Michigan if the speech he is now delivering was not mimeographed on machines of the Special Committee To Investigate the National Defense Program?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; it was. Those who mimeographed it are working for the committee and for the Government.

The critical phrase in the act of 1943 is as follows:

> Records * * * that do not appear to have sufficient administrative, legal, research, or other value to warrant their further preservation by the Government.

The discretion in interpretation of this phrase is properly, in my judgment, left in the Archivist.

In speaking of legislation which may be needed, however, it should be called to the attention of the Congress that no law exists which requires any public officer to make any record of his doings in the discharge of his public trust. He can do business, as I previously stated, out of his hat if he so desires. Once having created records, however, he becomes subject to the criminal law and the act relating to the disposal of public records which I have previously cited. In my judgment there should be a requirement that public officials make a record of their public acts.

While, as I pointed out in citations of the laws, there are existing legal remedies against the appropriation of public records, and that the crying need is for their enforcement, the questions of ethics involved transcend legal technicalities. Our age seems to be marked with an obvious deterioration of individual moral standards, a flagrant disregard by men on the highest levels for what used to be known by the old-fashioned words of honor and integrity, and I submit that unless we recapture and reinvigorate those simple virtues, our laws will prove ineffectual and the character of all our people will suffer.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I desire to compliment the junior Senator from Michigan on the speech he has just delivered. He never rises on the Senate floor but that he brings food for thought to all who listen to him.

AMENDMENT OF THE NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE ACT OF 1940

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 1353, to amend the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended. I believe the bill is noncontroversial. It passed the House unanimously. It was reported favorably unanimously by the Senate Finance Committee. It has the support of the principal veterans' organizations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the bill by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 1353) to amend the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I have no idea at all what is proposed to be done by the bill. I do not know whether there is any objection to it. I have none myself. But I seriously doubt whether unanimous consent should be given to the consideration of legislation when no more Senators are present than there are now. If the request is pressed, I necessarily must make a point of no quorum.

Mr. MILLIKIN. If the Senator from New Mexico is adamant in that, I shall withdraw my request for unanimous consent for consideration of the bill.

Mr. HATCH. I am, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is withdrawn.

EDISON, LINCOLN, AND WASHINGTON

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, our people are fortunate indeed to celebrate in this month of February the births of three immortal Americans. Each of these Americans lived at different times in our national existence. Yet, there is between them a golden bond of common devotion to the American ideal of freedom and common sacrifice for that ideal. Each embodied such fundamental American virtues, such personal greatness and inspiring nobility, that each year we return, figuratively speaking, to their shrines and take on new strength, new courage, in the fight that lies before us for the development of the Republic. A eulogy of these men is no mere empty formality; it involves a challenge to us to be worthy of these men whom words of praise cannot adequately commend.

THOMAS A. EDISON

Today is the one hundredth anniversary of "our first February son," Thomas Alva Edison, the electrical wizard of Menlo Park, the holder of 1,097 patents from the United States Government, more than have ever been held by any other individual.

Today we celebrate the birthday of the inventor of the electric light, the phonograph, the silent and talking motion picture, the alkaline storage battery, the carbon telephone transmitter, which made the telephone practical, the improved dynamo, the electric indicator, foundation of modern electronics, and hundreds of other brilliant new devices and processes. We celebrate the birthday of the genius who was described by one teacher as "addled," because of his fierce imagination—a man whose formal schooling totaled only 3 months and yet who gave birth to new industries with a capital evaluation of $20,000,000,000, and employing more than 4,000,000 men and women.

But it is not only as a great inventor that we honor Thomas Alva Edison; it is also as a great man that we do honor to him. Edison was the living proof of the richness of freedom's soil. In America's atmosphere of liberty and equality, of pioneering and self-reliance, he developed the fundamental virtues of industry, energy, independence, which are a part of the American heritage. He was a firm believer in natural order and spent his whole energies proving the fact that man can tap tremendous forces around him if he will but seek to study the universal laws which govern each situation. The force of electricity existed long before Edison harnessed it; it had been waiting for uncounted centuries for a man of his genius and his insight to reach out and control it for human good. Today there are countless spiritual forces which men can tap to achieve for themselves a better world, a higher standard of living, and a more abundant life.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

I have said that there were two other great men whose birthdays are celebrated this month. They are the sixteenth President of the United States, the Great Emancipator, Abraham Lincoln, whose birthday we celebrate tomorrow, and the first President of the United States, George Washington, whose birthday we celebrate the Saturday after next. Throughout the length and breadth of this land Americans are hearing this week the story of our Civil War President, the man who preserved the Union, the man who exemplified faith, love of the Republic, humor, and honesty, as fully as did any other man in America's history. More has been written about him, indeed, than about any other figure in the history of mankind, and deservedly so.

Tonight it will be my privilege and pleasure to look back into the life of this great figure and seek therein lessons which we may use in these times. They are lessons of triumph over failure, of perseverance against great odds, of the victory of justice. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that the text of an address which I shall deliver tonight before a Montgomery County Republican group be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A LINCOLN HOMECOMING

At this time of year, America is again "coming home"—it is a Lincoln homecoming.

Yes; on the occasion of this great but humble man's birthday, 140,000,000 Americans "come home" again to the presence of Abraham Lincoln, the great emancipator, sixteenth President of the United States. It is fitting that all of our people should do so, for Lincoln loved the people. It was, of course, he who wisely said, "The Lord must love the common people; He made so many of them."

This year, as every year, we stand, figuratively speaking, before his shrine; our thoughts turn back to his life, to his career, to his unforgettable thoughts and deeds. We feel again the warmth of his homespun humor, the greatness of his love of country.

This is a Lincoln homecoming. From it, we gain new inspiration, new devotion to his principles, new encouragement.

We will think of the man who said these great words which are so meaningful to us after the Second World War:

"With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the Nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and orphan, to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations."

MEMORIES OF LINCOLN'S LIFE

Our thoughts go back first to the story of Lincoln's life. We recall his birth in a log cabin in Kentucky in 1809. We remember that both Thomas Lincoln, Abraham's father, and Nancy Hanks, his mother, could not read nor write. Young Abraham himself had but a few good books to read in his early years—the Bible, Robinson Crusoe, Pilgrim's Progress, Aesop's Fables, and a few others. Lincoln had very little formal schooling; in all, he did not attend school for more than 1 year.

He was self-taught, schooled in the university of hard knocks—hard knocks like the loss of his beloved mother when he was only 9. She was the woman of whom he later said, "All that I am and all that I ever hope to be I owe to my angel mother."

Lincoln knew the meaning of work. He became a rail splitter, a storekeeper, a country lawyer. He acted as a village postmaster, as a deputy surveyor. The road was not easy. His was a story of triumph over failure. He lost his sweetheart as he had lost his mother. He entered business, failed, and spent 17 years developing his mind and in paying up the debts of a worthless partner. He always paid his obligations. He tried to get an appointment to the United States Land Office, but failed. He was a candidate for the Vice Presidency, but was defeated. He ran for the Senate, but lost out to Stephen Douglas. But Lincoln never said "quit."

When at last he became President, he was confronted with the most serious crisis America had faced, the secession of the South. He—the man of peace—was to be Commander in Chief of our armed forces in a bloody civil war. The Union forces suffered defeat after defeat. Voices such as Horace Greeley's called to him to let the South go.

But, although his heart was heavy with the tragic loss in human life of Americans on both sides, he would not see the Union destroyed; as he said: "The house divided against itself could not stand," and Lincoln was determined to have that house united forever. How fortunate it was that his decision prevailed, and that, at least, peace came and the Union was restored. Yes, we recall, too, his untimely death in 1865.

LINCOLN'S LEGACY TO AMERICA

In the few, short years of his earthly existence—1809–65—he had left his America an incomparable legacy—a heritage of great thoughts and great deeds unmatched by almost any other American before or since save George Washington.

We might recall now what Lincoln said of our first President, whose birthday we are to celebrate next week.

Lincoln said:

"Washington is the mightiest name of earth—long since mightiest in the cause of civil liberty, still mightiest in moral reformation. On that name no eulogy is expected. It cannot be. To add brightness to the sun or glory to the name of Washington is alike impossible. Let none attempt it. In solemn awe pronounce the name, and in its naked deathless splendor leave it shining on."

Thus spoke Lincoln. How true are Lincoln's words not only of Washington but of Lincoln himself. On his name, as on Washington's name, no eulogy is really expected.

This is what Lincoln said about the office of the Presidency itself:

"I happen temporarily to occupy this big White House. I am a living witness that any one of your children may look to come here, as my father's child has. It is in order that each one of you may have, through this free Government which we have enjoyed, an open field and a fair chance * * * that the struggle should be maintained, that we may not lose our birthright."

Let us think for a few moments now on the Lincoln legacy. Let us come home to Lincoln's thoughts. Any homecoming is always a source of inspiration, and there are many, many ways in which Lincoln inspires us. Let us take but four of these ways.

1. INSPIRATION FOR PIONEERING

Lincoln first inspires us to be pioneers in blazing new trails in challenging times. Consider how appropriate this is in this atomic age, when America is confronted at every hand by problems which are new and unique. Here is Lincoln's advice, and I read from his words:

"The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate to the stormy present. The occasion is piled high with difficulty, and we must rise with the occasion. As our case is new, so we must think anew and act anew. We must disenthrall ourselves, and then we shall save our country."

How appropriate, my friends, this thought is for the present.

Yes; it was Lincoln, too, who taught us to respect the traditions of the past while moving ahead in progress. Here are his words:

"I do not mean to say that we are bound to follow implicitly in whatever our fathers did. To do so would be to discard all the lights of current experience, to reject all progress, all improvement. What I do say is that if we would supplant the opinions and policy of our fathers in any case we should do so upon evidence so conclusive and argument so clear that even their great authority, fairly considered and weighed, cannot stand."

2. INSPIRATION FOR LABOR PEACE

Second, Lincoln inspires us for labor peace. As a man who had worked throughout his life, he knew the problems of labor, but as a builder and sustainer he knew the problems of those who employed labor. This is what he said about the attitude of labor:

"The strongest bond of sympathy, outside the family relation, should be the one uniting all working people; nor should this lead to a war upon property or the owner of property. Let not him who is houseless pull down the house of another, but let him labor diligently and build one for himself; thus by example assuring himself, his own house will be safe from violence when built."

God grant we all will follow this advice.

3. INSPIRATION FOR SELF-RELIANCE

Third, Lincoln's whole life is proof of the value of independence and self-reliance. He believed in each man using his God-given initiative and talents to work out his own destiny. He did not believe in relying on government or on any other man. This is what he said about government's relation to the individual:

"The legitimate object of government is to do for a community of people whatever they need to have done, but cannot do it all, or cannot do so well in their separate or individual capacities. In all that people can individually do for themselves the Government ought not to interfere."

What a directive for all of us. Here we find a Lincoln doctrine which merits our serious thought.

For some years now there has been too much interference in State and local fields by the Federal Government—in those fields of activity where the people themselves and not the Government should act. Self-regulation can eliminate much unwarranted interference by the Federal Government. Individuals, groups, business and labor, communities and States—if they fully accept their responsibilities and their obligations—can eliminate much of the necessity for Federal intervention and regulation. Self-reliance—rebirth of American initiative—can do more than anything else to eliminate Federal interference and controls.

4. INSPIRATION FOR FAITH

Fourth, Lincoln had a faith in God, his Maker, in the power greater than mortal man. He believed in prayer and often said, "I have often been driven to my knees in prayer because there was no other place to go." Yes; Lincoln communed with his Maker and gained strength therefrom. He knew God is greater than any of our problems and could, therefore, help us to solve our problems.

He was not ashamed in the midst of his Cabinet meetings to pray. He knew the value of prayer.

Thus Lincoln inspires us in these four ways and countless more. He inspires us to pioneer, to secure labor peace, to be self-reliant, to have faith.

With that faith, we can make sure that, in his words, "government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from this earth."

This can be our real Lincoln homecoming—to preserve the Republic as he would preserve it—strong, independent, and to pass it on vital and unimpaired to our children and to our children's children.

LINCOLN IN THE YEAR 1947

Now let us pause and ask ourselves if Lincoln were here in person, as he is in the spirit, how would he meet the challenges of this age?

I am sure that he would insist upon the preservation of our free enterprise and free institutions as the main bulwark against foreignisms and foreign subversive forces.

LABOR PEACE

I am sure he would insist that peace at home is vital; that the public interest demands that labor and capital cease their destructive internecine warfare. I am sure that Lincoln would insist, after our experience during the New Deal years, not in a spirit of revenge but because the national life demands it, that strikes against the Government were not only illegal but would not be tolerated; that jurisdictional strikes and secondary boycotts must cease; that unions must be made responsible for breach of contract the same as employers; that labor racketeerism must stop.

Of course, Lincoln would say that the right to free collective bargaining, as a two-way street, must continue; that high wages must be paid in order that the national income as well as labor itself would be taken care of, but that wages must not be paid unless there is an equivalent in production. I also think Lincoln would say that war controls must cease as soon as it is practicable for them to cease; that every effort must be made to balance the budget, and that to do so, unproductive seat warmers in Government must be done away with. Lincoln would not hesitate to use the pruning knife in a situation such as we are meeting now. It will be remembered that the Republican administration, after the last World War, cut the debt 40 percent in 10 years and also reduced the people's taxes.

I think that Lincoln would approve the continuance of the so-called Truman Investigating Committee. He never liked fraud and deceit and chiseling. Therefore, he would say that in order to recoup funds and in order that lessons might be learned for the future, it is necessary that an impartial investigation of frauds go on.

In the portal-to-portal matter, I think that Lincoln too would insist that the legislative branch of the Government clear up the mess in no uncertain terms. We all know that the unsettled condition in which industry now finds itself as a result of these suits doesn't make for the economic health of the country. As a lawyer, he would know that the lower court's decision last Saturday is simply a decision on the facts in that particular case and that there is every reason why the legislature should redefine its position with unmistakable clarity in relation to the general issue of portal-to-portal pay to apply to all cases.

WORLD PEACE

I am sure that Lincoln would approve the position that the Republican Party has taken in relation to the matter of world peace. We must go ahead, seeking to make the United Nations an effective organization for the peace af the world, but we must also keep our powder dry. We have not forgotten that after the First World War the League of Nations was organized. Why, we even abolished war with the Kellogg-Briand Pact. But war came. Now folks are talking about outlawing the atomic bomb. But the Republicans say that we had better keep our national police and fire departments ready to go into action instantly for our own safety and our peace. I addressed a letter recently to the President of the United States, calling for total plans against total emergency. I think Lincoln would approve that because he always was a realist, a man who has his feet on the ground.

America has not the conquest bug, but the recent war clearly shows that other nations have.

CONCLUSION

Ladies and gentlemen, it has been a joy for Mrs. Wiley and myself to be here, and I want to congratulate you go-getting Republicans on your success. You have done a great job.

It is for us, the living, as Lincoln said, to be dedicated to the unfinished task that lies before us. It is for us to catch hold of his spirit and dedicate ourselves anew to the preservation of the Republic in this atomic age.

SHORTAGE OF BOXCARS

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I wish again to invite the attention of the Senate to the serious boxcar situation existing on American railroads. This situation is so serious and acute that it approaches a national scandal comparable in its effect to the catastrophe of the coal crisis in England at the present time. It finds us in the position of having fewer boxcars on American railroads today than we had at the beginning of the war. The situation is so serious that we in the Northwest may not be able to market all our 1946 crop. It is so acute that it prompted Secretary of Agriculture Anderson to tell the Senate Agriculture Committee that our ability to export food for grain to destitute Europe depends largely upon our ability to transport grain to the seaboard. The western railroads have on their tracks only approximately 55 to 65 percent of their ownership cars.

This condition has aggravated our marketing problem in the Northwest for the past 3 or 4 years, to the extent of penalizing farmers continually from 5 to 10 cents a bushel because local elevators cannot obtain boxcars to enable them to take advantage of the cash market.

During this acute boxcar shortage we have been exporting approximately one boxcar for every two placed on American railroads. I understand that this is directly attributable to a program sponsored by the former Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace, a very impractical businessman.

In connection with my remarks, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very timely and illuminating editorial entitled "Boxcars Again," published in the Fargo Forum, of Fargo, N. Dak., under date of February 8, 1947.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOXCARS AGAIN

On the subject of the boxcar shortage, the Fargo Forum recently spoke of the lack of materials which, in large part, has been due to Government policies. It also indicated that the more permanent answer to the shortage might be found in clearing up some of the Government-created uncertainties under which the railroads are operating.

After scanning testimony given before the Senate Commerce Subcommittee this week, it seems that these viewpoints are much strengthened. True, there was a statement from the Interstate Commerce Commission which said that every effort was being made to get equitable distribution of freight cars throughout the country, but, even so, there have been apparent seasonal inequities.

But the shortage of cars is the chief trouble, according to testimony at the inquiry. That stems, it seems, mainly from Government policies, or the lack of policies, and from the Government-created uncertainties put in the way of the railroads.

We just haven't got enough boxcars, though we are making thousands of boxcars for Europe. Some of the old rolling stock is wearing out, and, since production has not been kept up to the point of taking care of losses through obsolescence, we are getting less rolling stock all the time.

In his testimony Col. J. M. Johnson, Director of the Office of Defense Transportation, said that the shortage already has become a national scandal. He held that a Government agency had not issued directives for priorities to make effective the priority orders of the White House for building materials for cars. He declared that 300,000 new boxcars need to be built to keep transportation efficiently running.

In reporting the inquiry, one newsman wrote this of the Johnson statement: "The White House orders dated last September 20 called for priorities for building materials to construct 7,000 boxcars per month, Johnson said. The number was ridiculously low, but even so one-third or one-half of that many are now being turned out, he said. Johnson described himself as having been bitterly disappointed by the failure of execution of orders and their lack, therefore, of results. Though it was explained by General Fleming that the controls of materials had terminated in September 1945 the Government still had authority to control the flow of materials by issuing priorities, officials testified."

Be this as it may, even though the testimony is only partly right it indicates either woefully poor Government policy, or no certain policy at all. The ramifications of the problem of boxcar shortages goes further, too, for these have been, and still are, Government-created uncertainties facing the railroads.

THE LEGISLATIVE BUDGET

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, this morning the newspapers carried a story with relation to certain information which was released yesterday by the Department of Commerce, the gist of which was that monthly income payments to individuals for the year 1946 had reached a new all-time high of more than $165,000,000,000. That was $4,000,000,000 more than income payments for 1945; but, more important even than that, it was twice as much as income payments in 1940.

In these circumstances it seems to me that when the Committee on the Legislative Budget meets next Friday to receive the report of the subcommittee and to be told what is to be done about appropriations and the budget during next year, that meeting ought to be open to the public. I see no reason why the Committee on the Legislative Budget should receive the report of the subcommittee in executive session. I hope that the committee will give instructions that the meeting shall be in public.

Mr. President, I rose to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement issued by the Department of Commerce with respect to income payments to individuals.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF INDIVIDUAL INCOME-TAX RATES

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, recently the daily press and other publications have discussed the pros and cons of the proposed reduction of individual income-tax rates. Some Members of the Congress have expressed the opinion that we cannot afford to reduce taxes. Others have expressed doubt, while some have disagreed with the merits of the proposed flat 20 percent cut on incomes up to $302,000 and about 10½ percent on incomes above that amount. The answer to those who oppose an immediate tax reduction, or the proposed method, is to be found in the simple fact that we have reached the point of diminishing returns in the Federal tax program. In other words, the present rate is drying up the source of investments which would create new business enterprises, which would, in turn, produce a greater taxable income. Under existing rates, venture capital, which would otherwise create new business enterprises, more employment, greater taxable income, and increased production, will not take the risk involved for the small rewards remaining after Federal taxes. For example, the Federal tax on a $200,000 income is $156,820. An investment of $2,500,000 yielding 8 percent is required to produce $200,000. After Federal taxes, this is about 1⅘ percent return on the investment. Under such circumstances, what incentive does the investor have to venture his capital in a new enterprise? The result, of course, has been to drive investment money into securities of established industries or Government bonds instead of new productive enterprise. Between 1921 and 1926 we reduced surtax rates from a high of 61 percent to a low of 20 percent, and each successive year produced increased taxable income because of the additional venture money released for new productivity. The time is at hand when we must find the tax level which will satisfy the legitimate needs of Government and at the same time produce the greatest individual prosperity for the taxpayer.

About 70 percent of our national income is represented by individual incomes of $2,000 or less. It is argued that the lower brackets must have a greater reduction than the proposed 20 percent. It must follow that if the tax reduction on this large percentage of our national income is increased over the 20-percent figure, the remainder of the national income must continue to carry a paralyzing burden. New business enterprises, more employment, additional taxable income, and increased production must necessarily come from the higher-income brackets. To relieve one segment of our economy at the expense of another segment is a short-sighted policy. At a later date I expect to discuss at greater length the matter of taxation in relation to our national economy.

Mr. President, a few days ago I received a copy of a statement by Dr. Willford I. King, chairman of the Committee for Constitutional Government, on this subject, which I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF DR. WILLFORD I. KING, CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE FOR CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT, FEBRUARY 7, 1947

Is success criminal? The answer to this question ought to be the principal determinant of the action of Congress in setting up income tax schedules for 1947, and future years. If the man who goes into business, and wins, is an enemy of the public, he should be duly punished. A logical form of punishment may be to fine him, in proportion to his winnings. If he succeeds in making $1,000,000 in a year, it may be proper to fine him some $900,000 or $950,000. Use of the moneys thus collected may serve to offset part of the malign effects of his misdeeds.

If success is criminal, the question, of course, arises as to why we should permit our statutes to be so framed as to encourage competition. During most of the past history of the United States, the rules of the game, for business, have been such that a man who had sufficient ingenuity might produce in great abundance things especially wanted by the public, and sell these articles at prices lower than his less efficient competitors could possibly charge. By so doing, he might make millions. Outstanding examples of men who did exactly this are Frank W. Woolworth and Henry Ford. Were these actions antisocial? Did they deserve punishment? If so, the rules are improper, and should be amended promptly.

The Russians have felt that the rules are wrong. That nation operates under an entirely different set. The Russians also have great natural resources. Under their rules, they succeed in producing perhaps one-fifth, perhaps one-fourth, as much per capita as the people of the United States do, under our rules. History shows that those countries which have put fewest restrictions on profit making have been the ones that have forged ahead and become most prosperous. In the light of this fact, is it safe to change the rules and punish the profit makers? Will this help the common man?

THE WELLSPRING OF CAPITAL

During the prewar period in the United States, the total amount of money invested in new issues of stocks and bonds paralleled very closely the aggregate, after-tax income of that relatively small portion of our citizens who receive incomes of $5,000 or more, respectively. The evidence indicates that this group of citizens spent about $3,000,000,000 per year for living expenses, and that, out of what remained, they invested about 74 percent in new issues of securities. Moreover, it appears that they furnished the great bulk of the money invested in such securities.

One does not have to be much of an economist to understand that progress in the United States is dependent primarily upon new capital investment. Our factory workers turn out large quantities of goods because, on the average, each has some $6,000 worth of tools and equipment with which to work. European workers, closely related racially and probably not much less industrious than American workers, because they do not have such good tools and equipment, turn out from one-fifth to one-half as much per man-hour.

During the period 1931 to 1939, heavy taxes cut down seriously the incomes of persons receiving $5,000, or more, each. As a result, little new capital flowed into industry. Was it mere accident that, during this period, our industry stagnated? Do we want to take a chance on having this recur?

The gross value of the product, per factory worker, has gone up as the capital investment, per worker, has increased. The tremendous increase in real hourly wages, which has occurred in the United States, has been roughly proportional to the increase in the average capital supply per worker. Because tools and equipment have improved, American workers today produce in an hour four or five times as much as did their grandfathers, and, hence, they get as much in the way of food and clothing, and furnishings, for an hour, as their grandfathers could obtain for 4 or 5 hours' work. If the income-tax rates now prevailing had been in force all the time during the last century, it seems highly improbable that any such advance in the workingman's scale of living could have occurred.

THE RIGHT TO PROFITS

During most of our history the American philosophy has been that a man had a right to profits honestly won. When a burglar has broken into a man's safe and stolen even a small part of these profits the burglar has been sent to jail for years. Recently, however, our ideas have changed and we have considered it laudable for Federal collectors to take, from the successful businessman, 90 percent, or more, of his profits. Can this procedure be justified on the basis of any system of ethics as fitting in with American ideals? Even if such action is excused during the emergency of war can it be condoned in time of peace?

Apologists for this system of legalized confiscation will of course say that without it it is impossible to raise sufficient revenues to balance the budget. What are the facts?

Unfortunately, the income-tax authorities have not made available recently statistics on the incomes of the various classes of income recipients. However, a rough estimate, made on the basis of the United States Department of Commerce figures, indicates that at the present time, out of the annual income total of $172,000,000,000, some $150,000,000,000 goes to persons in the $5,000 or under brackets and that not more than $8,000,000,000 is received by those having incomes of $20,000 or over. Perhaps the Government secures from this class of taxes around $5,000,000,000. Doubtless, the statisticians of the Bureau of Internal Revenue can, if they desire, produce more accurate estimates.

If the income-tax rates in the upper brackets were reduced to levels reasonable as compared to the rates levied on the middle and lower brackets the probabilities are that the total income tax paid by persons having incomes above $20,000 might be $2,500,000,000. Therefore, the prospective loss of revenue resulting from the abolition of confiscatory taxes would probably not be more than $2,500,000,000, and might be much less. It certainly would not amount to as much as 2 percent of the incomes of persons having incomes of $5,000 or less.

LOSS OF INCENTIVE

These high incomes are, as a rule, received by men of unusual ability as directors of industry. When a man of this type knows that whatever additional income he makes will, mainly, be turned over to the Federal Treasury, unless he is altruistic in the extreme, he can hardly be expected to strive very vigorously to increase output. Much less is he likely to engage in ventures involving material risk, and it is risks of that type which have, in the past, been largely responsible for the spectacular achievements of American industry—which have made our technology so superior to that of other nations—which, indeed, largely accounts for our ability to achieve victory in World War II.

Furthermore, from the purely selfish standpoint of those in the lower income brackets, is the Robin Hood policy of robbing the rich for the benefit of the poor profitable? When Lenin took power, the Russian people felt that by seizing the property of the rich everyone would be made prosperous. The actual result was that shortly thereafter 14,000,000 of the Russian rank and file died of starvation.

In our own country, during the 1930's, by various repressive policies, we kept the prosperous class from accumulating any notable surpluses. As a result, the Nation's capital supply was not augmented. At the same time, the total income of the working class fell to the lowest level in years.

As the income-tax authorities will confirm, it will take but a very small increase in exemptions, or a very small reduction in the basic tax rate, to cut the Federal revenues by more than the $2,000,000,000 or $3,000,000,000 now derived by maintaining exorbitant rates on those in the upper brackets. The proportion of the income going to persons receiving less than $5,000 each is so overwhelming that the savings of $2,000,000,000 or $3,000,000,000 will not give to the persons in these brackets sufficient relief to be noticeable.

MULTIPLICATION OF WAGES

During the last century, because of the savings of the thrifty, the capital investment per worker has been multiplied by 10. Largely as a result of this investment, the worker's real hourly wage has been multiplied by 5. Does he want to stop this process by cutting his tax bill by only a few dollars per year?

At present, by taxing away those $2,000,000,000 or $3,000,000,000 of income in the upper brackets that normally go to furnish the bulk of new capital supply for the Nation, the millions of taxpayers in the lower brackets can save a few dollars each. Is this not, however, a penny-wise, pound-foolish policy, if it hampers seriously the rapid advance in productivity and wages which, experience shows, follows the investment of new capital in industry? Saving a few percent of one's income today and cutting off the possibility of doubling that income in the future is not a policy which will, if he understands it, appeal to the thoughtful American workingman.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS PROGRAM—DOMESTIC WATCH INDUSTRY

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, last Friday the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN] made a statement proposing certain changes to be made in the negotiation of future trade agreements—changes they hoped the State Department might agree to in response to criticism of the conduct of the trade-agreements program.

The fact that my two colleagues have recognized the need for improvement in this program is an encouraging sign. It seems clear to me, however, that their proposals do not get at the root of the evil.

I summarize the proposed changes, as follows:

First, the Tariff Commission would have greater authority to study the effects of tariff reductions and to make public recommendations to the President.

Second, the administration would enforce more strictly its most-favored-nation policy, which it claims it has been enforcing all along.

Third, an escape clause would be incorporated in all future agreements, permitting us to cancel unwise concessions.

I shall not take much time on the first two points.

First, the proposal to transfer certain powers from the State Department to the Tariff Commission sounds all right; but for 13 years the appointment of members of the Commission has been under the control of New Deal Presidents. Any man who has been appointed during that period has had to be acceptable to the State Department. During that whole period the Tariff Commission has been used in the furtherance of the trade-agreements program. To transfer authority now to the Tariff Commission is to take power away from Mr. Clayton's right hand and place it in his left hand.

Second, the proposal that the State Department enforce more strictly its own most-favored-nation policy is interesting if only as an indication that my two colleagues recognize that the State Department has not been adhering to its own principles. They ask the Department to promise again to do what it has so often promised to do in the past.

Third, the proposal relating to an escape clause deserves more attention. In order to make the record complete, I should like to read into the RECORD at this point the language of the so-called Mexican escape clause, article XI of the 1942 trade agreement with Mexico, which is as follows:

1. If, as a result of unforeseen developments and of the concession granted on any article enumerated and described in the schedules annexed to this agreement, such article is being imported in such increased quantities and under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers of like or similar articles, the Government of either country shall be free to withdraw the concession, in whole or in part, or to modify it to the extent and for such time as may be necessary to prevent such injury.

Accordingly, if the President of the United States of America finds as a fact that imports of any article enumerated and described in schedule II or schedule III are entering the United States of America under the circumstances specified in the preceding sentence, he shall determine whether the withdrawal, in whole or in part, of the concession with regard to the article, or any modification of the concession, by the imposition of quantitative regulations or otherwise, is necessary to prevent such injury, and he shall, if he finds that the public interest will be served thereby, proclaim such finding and determination, and on and after the effective date specified in such proclamation, and so long as such proclamation remains in effect, imports of the article into the United States of America shall be subject to the customs treatment so determined to be necessary to prevent such injury. Similarly, if the Government of the United Mexican States finds as a fact that any article enumerated and described in schedule I is being imported into the United Mexican States under the circumstances specified, it may, if it finds that the public interest will be served thereby, withdraw in whole or in part the concession with regard to the article, or modify the concession by the imposition of quantitative regulations or otherwise, to the extent and for such time as may be necessary to prevent such injury.

2. Before the Government of either country shall withdraw or modify a concession pursuant to the provisions of paragraph 1 of this article, it shall give notice in writing to the Government of the other country as far in advance as may be practicable and shall afford such other Government an opportunity to consult with it in respect of the proposed action; and if agreement with respect thereto is not reached the Government which proposes to take such action shall, nevertheless, be free to do so and the other Government shall be free within 30 days after such action is taken to terminate this agreement in whole or in part on 30 days' written notice.

That is the so-called Mexican escape clause. There is nothing wrong with it. It is an excellent clause and should be included in our trade agreements. If it were used effectively undoubtedly it could provide some relief to an injured industry. Unfortunately, there is abundant evidence that our State Department is likely to use it very, very little, if at all. That statement is based on the experience that many industries have had with the State Department under trade agreements already negotiated.

The use of this escape clause is suggested as a new departure which would, for the first time, guarantee relief to domestic producers. As a matter of fact, the idea is not new. It was used more than 4 years ago in the Mexican agreement. But more important, it should be realized that the State Department has always had a legal right to escape from unfavorable agreements or unfavorable concessions.

Most of the agreements now in effect were negotiated during the late thirties and were entered into for an initial period of 3 years. Almost all of them have now run for a 3-year period, but continue automatically under their terms, subject to a right by either party to cancel upon 6 months' notice. In the case of any of these agreements, therefore, at any time during the past 6 or 8 years, it would have been possible for the State Department to reopen the agreement in question, renegotiate its terms, or cancel it entirely on 6 months' notice.

In other words, our State Department has all the time had legal escape rights on almost all the treaties now in effect. The trouble has been that it has refused to make use of those rights, even when a domestic industry has been able to show substantial injury.

No escape clause will be of any value unless the administration is willing to use it.

Today, I should like to tell the Senate briefly the story of one vital American industry which has suffered injury from a trade agreement, which has asked for relief from the State Department, and which has failed to receive the relief to which it was entitled. That industry is the American watch-manufacturing industry. My interest in this industry arises out of the fact that one of the jeweled-watch manufacturers has a plant in my State, at Lincoln, Nebr.

Switzerland is the only other country in the world which is a major producer of timekeeping instruments. The industry in that country controls the timekeeping markets of the world. Since 1930, it has been a Government-controlled and subsidized trust. It has received both direct and indirect financial assistance from the Government. The publications of our own Tariff Commission establish these facts, and these facts are of tremendous importance to us. Should the industry in this country disappear or be rendered impotent, we would be at the mercy of a foreign trust, not only in times of peace but also in times of war. Let us not forget that during much of the late war Switzerland was completely surrounded and cut off from us by our enemies.

The essentiality of this industry in time of war is indicated in a recent Tariff Commission report, from which I quote:

The four domestic manufacturers of jeweled watches of quality not only produced war materials similar to those made by certain manufacturers in other industries but they also made a wide range of war materials which no other class of domestic manufacturers produced or could have produced, at least within as short a period. These four companies were the only ones which had the equipment and the reservoir of skills adequate for large-scale manufacture of certain precision timing devices and other instruments which the armed services required. * * * Some of the products of manufacturers of clock-type watches, especially certain kinds of mechanical timepieces, were similar to those of the domestic manufacturers of jeweled watches of quality. * * * During the war, the armed services were not able to obtain many of the wide range of articles they required as rapidly as they desired them. If, for example, the country's peacetime facilities for producing jeweled watches of quality had been larger than they actually were, the armed services could presumably have obtained certain time instruments and other devices more rapidly and in larger quantity than they did.

Mr. President, let me add that the watch-manufacturing processes and the skill required of employees is such that, once down, the industry can neither be quickly expanded nor recreated. The British realized that lesson during the recent World War, and are now desperately attempting to establish a watch industry by means of government subsidies.

By 1936, when the State Department negotiated its trade agreement with Switzerland, there were only three exclusively American manufacturers of jeweled watches and four manufacturers of nonjeweled watches left in this country. One company in the jeweled-watch field, although predominantly an importer of Swiss movements, was making parts for and assembling some watches in this country. This is still the situation today; and it must necessarily deteriorate, so long as the difference in labor costs here and abroad continues, unless some realistic relief is afforded the industry by the State Department or by the Congress.

Against this kind of a background, and over the protests of the industry, our Government, through the trade agreement of 1936 with Switzerland, reduced the import duties on watches by about 34 percent on the average. I am given to understand that at the time of making the agreement, one of the principal considerations asserted in justification of doing so was the fact that we had debased the value of our dollar in 1934. Yet, Mr. President, a few months after the signing of the agreement, in the fall of 1936, the Swiss devalued their franc by more than 25 percent. By this devaluation, the importers of Swiss watches received a further reduction in landed costs not contemplated when the agreement was entered into. But the State Department did nothing about it.

What has been the effect of the trade agreement on the two segments of the American industry? In the five preagreement years, 1931–35, American-made jeweled watches supplied 53 percent of the American market, and watches with imported movements, the other 47 percent. In the 6 years following, 1936–41, the domestic industry's share of the market fell from 53 to 41 percent, a decline of over one-fifth. These computations include all the foreign-made watches which were competitive with the products of our own jeweled-watch industry, including those containing two to seven jewels. But they exclude the foreign-made watches containing only one or no jewels which were not competitive with American-made jeweled watches. A comparison showing the effect of the agreement on the American nonjeweled watch industry is equally striking. Shipments of domestic nonjeweled watch manufacturers increased from 3,000,000 wrist watches in 1935 to only 3,750,000 in 1941. Imports of competing watches increased during the same period from 740,000 to 1,537,000. Thus the imports of Swiss watches of this type increased more than 100 percent, while the business of the American manufacturers increased only 25 percent. These computations do not include American-made nonjeweled pocket watches.

In short, the American industry was forced out of its dominant position in its own market—directly forced out of a market which it had created many years ago by machine methods later copied by the Swiss. What is worse, the growth of the American industry was stunted just previous to the most devastating war in history. Then that slow strangulation process was perpetuated by turning the market completely over to the Swiss, not only during the war but also during the reconversion period of the American industry.

This shows how absurd is the statement we hear again and again from the State Department that "no domestic industry has suffered serious injury." Mr. President, does an American industry have to go bankrupt before the State Department will admit that it has suffered serious injury? How can the people of this country expect to call upon this industry in any future emergency if their elected representatives do not guarantee to the industry equality of opportunity against unreasonable foreign competition?

It is customary for the State Department, in dealing with this point, to assemble impressive statistics indicating for the domestic industry in question that sales, profits, and employment have increased between 1934—prior to the trade agreements program—and 1939 or 1940—after the damaging concessions were made. With the watch industry, as with most other American industries, it is possible to show that business was better in 1939 than in 1934. The State Department then blandly accepts full credit for any such improvement in business over the amount of business done during the depths of the depression.

The fallacy of this type of argument is so obvious that it should deceive no one. Naturally, almost any kind of business was in better shape by 1939 or 1940 than it was in 1934. The point here is that the domestic industry certainly lost one-fifth of its preagreement market, and thus failed to regain, even in 1939, 1940, and 1941 the share of the market it formerly held.

Then came the war. The American watch industry, jeweled and nonjeweled, was converted to war work. What American-made watches were sold thereafter and until last year were doled out from stocks on hand in 1942. The Swiss had the market virtually to themselves, and they took full advantage of the situation, as is indicated by the following watch-importation figures:

1942	5,293,000
1943	7,996,000
1944	6,915,000
1945	9,398,000
Total	29,601,000

The annual average is almost seven and one-half million watches.

These annual importations during the war were almost two and one-half times the 3,000,000 watches imported per annum during the 6 years of 1936–41. They were almost 10 times the average imports of 770,000 during the 5 years, 1931–35, preceding the Swiss agreement. The 29,000,000 watches imported during the war filled all the commercial-market demand during that period, and also some of the future demand, since other commodities were not available.

As early as March 1944, the domestic jeweled-watch industry realized that its postwar future was being seriously jeopardized by the heavy importations of Swiss watches during the war. It also realized that there would be no pent-up demand for watches after the war, as in the case of other industries which had no foreign competition. Realizing these facts, one of the jeweled-watch producers, acting with the endorsement of the other two, filed an application for relief with the Committee for Reciprocity Information. A courteous acknowledgment was received, but no hearing was held on that application.

In January 1945, 10 months later, a second application on behalf of the watch manufacturers was filed. A hearing was promptly held on this application. Then, again, for months nothing happened.

Nine months later, in October 1945, the importers and the American Watch Workers Union were given a hearing. Then 6 more months passed while nothing happened.

Finally in April 1946, 25 months—more than 2 years—after the trade agreements organization had first been put on notice of the situation confronting the industry, an agreement with the Swiss Government was announced in the form of an exchange of notes which made certain arrangements intended to give the domestic industry at least some slight measure of assistance.

Three specific points were dealt with in this exchange of notes. The Swiss Government agreed:

First, to limit its future watch shipments to the United States to the highest annual total it had ever been able to achieve—that is, 7,700,000 in 1945. It is to be noted that this is the annual total prewar Swiss imports—3,000,000—plus our entire domestic capacity.

Second, to attempt to prevent the indirect shipment of watches to this country from Switzerland through other countries. During 1945, the number of units entering indirectly in this manner was 1,700,000.

Third, to use its good offices to help American manufacturers obtain from Swiss sources certain types of watchmaking machinery theretofore supplied for 50 years. These machines were already on previously accepted orders with the Swiss machine industry, and were badly needed to replace machinery seriously deteriorated on domestic war work, while the Swiss were taking over 100 percent of the American market.

It will be observed that this exchange of notes would still permit Switzerland to ship watches here at a rate of over 2½ times as heavy as during the very profitable—for the Swiss—years of 1936–41. This was the best the State Department could do for a vital American industry whose prewar business had been adversely affected by the Swiss agreement and whose market had been saturated with wartime commercial business in which it had not been permitted to participate.

It will be observed further that enforcement of this agreement was left entirely to the Swiss, despite the fact that our State Department had the legal right to escape from the original Swiss agreement on 6 months' notice, renegotiating the terms of the agreement if it chose, and place enforcement in the hands of our own customs officials. How well have the Swiss lived up to this latter agreement? Official Department of Commerce figures show imports for the entire year 1946, including both direct and indirect shipments, of 9,654,931 units—over 250,000 more than the record total registered in 1945, and almost 2,000,000 above the 7,700,000 quota for direct shipments which Switzerland promised to observe. Official data are not available to divide this figure of 9,650,000 between direct and indirect shipments for the full year. If, however, these data, when they become available, should indicate that the Swiss have held the direct shipments down to the 7,700,000 figure promised, then it is clear that the 2,000,000 movements sent here through indirect channels represent an actual increase over indirect shipments of the preceding year in spite of the Swiss promise to try to wipe out such indirect shipments.

The other point in the exchange of notes related to securing Swiss machinery for the American industry. The American industry is still waiting for the machinery, but that is not all. Last summer they were advised that if it were to be made available at all, it would not be on a purchase basis, as always before, but on a lease basis, and some of the provisions in the proposed lease are:

1. No subsequent improvements made by the lessor (the Swiss) to be available to the lessee (the Americans), but
2. Subsequent improvements made by the Americans to be given to the Swiss
3. Inspection of the American plants to ascertain whether or not the lease provisions are being adhered to, and
4. Prices charged by the lessee for products made on the machinery to be subject to the approval of the lessor.

Obviously the last provision cannot be agreed to under our laws.

Mr. President, that brings us down to date. It appears from recent evidence that the Swiss watch trust is now ready to attempt to absorb, control, or destroy the last major watch manufacturing industry outside of Switzerland. It is perfectly clear that the Swiss Government has not even lived up to the very conservative concessions it pretended to make in April 1946. Why did the State Department not demand renegotiation of the Swiss agreement on 6 months' notice, and thus place in the hands of our United States customs officials the enforcement of the agreement?

Reciprocity should be recognized as a two-way street. It is worth inquiring what we got from Switzerland in return for the enormous advantage she gained through this 1936 trade agreement. For 5 years immediately preceding the trade agreement, we sold to Switzerland an annual average of $8,500,000 of goods and bought from her an average of $16,000,000.

In 1938, we sold her $10,000,000 and bought from her $23,000,000.

In 1941, we sold her $12,000,000 and bought $28,000,000.

In 1945, the Department of Commerce reports, we exported to Switzerland $60,000,000 and imported $83,000,000. It would seem that this $60,000,000 of exports was quite a substantial gain from the $8,500,000 prior to 1936, but upon inquiry into the items which make up this figure, I am surprised to learn that the Department of Commerce has included relief to the extent of $29,000,000. That leaves $31,000,000 of real exports and $83,000,000 of real imports for the year 1945, and of these imports $56,000,000 represents watches, cases, and parts. A résumé of these figures discloses:

1935: Imports 200 percent of exports.
1936: Imports 300 percent of exports.
1937: Imports 300 percent of exports.
1938: Imports 220 percent of exports.
1939: Imports 166 percent of exports.
1945: Imports 268 percent of exports.

In 1945 we paid a $52,000,000 bonus for $31,000,000 of export sales. The $50,000,000 is based on f. o. b. Swiss prices, which, when translated into consumer prices in the United States, is at least $150,000,000 required to be paid by the American consumer out of the purchasing power created by this and other American industries. What price exports.

The whole story might be summarized by saying that the domestic watch-manufacturing industry has been hurt by the Swiss agreement. It requested relief from the State Department. The relief promised was inadequate. Even that promise was not lived up to, and the State Department throughout declined to make use of such escape powers as it had. In other words, Mr. President, the State Department's attitude has been that of complete agreement with the Swiss approach to the solution of this problem in disregard of the American watch industry. This is why I place very little confidence in the changes proposed to the State Department.

Mr. President, after the First World War we disarmed our Military and Naval Establishments almost completely. We thought that would contribute to world peace. We discovered our mistake. We are not going to make that mistake a second time.

But our administration leaders have discovered a new solution, a new formula, to save the peace of the world. It is a formula of economic appeasement, a craze to give away our industrial strength to satisfy other nations. I am afraid, Mr. President, that this formula will work no better than the last one did. I am afraid that if we destroy our domestic-watch industry and other vital industries we shall find that these industries are just as essential to our security as ships, planes, and guns. I can only hope that we shall realize this danger before it is too late.

ADJOURNMENT TO FRIDAY

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, in a moment I propose to move an adjournment, but before I do so I wish to say that the next meeting of the Senate will be on Friday, and I express the very earnest hope that there will be no effort to bring before the Senate at that time any legislative matters except by unanimous consent. It is the desire that the day shall be a free day for Senators on both sides of the aisle.

I now move that the Senate stand in adjournment until Friday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Friday, February 14, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATION

Executive nomination received by the Senate February 11, 1947:

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

Josiah Marvel, Jr., of Delaware, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Denmark.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of all might and Father of all mercies, refresh us with the tides of Thy blessing as to Thy gracious altar we come. Grant that we may hear the whisper of Him by whose teaching we test our lives, as we walk amid life's throng and press.

Almighty God, today we pause in memory of him who sprang from the loins of but common soil, whose glory was not in ranks or titles, and whose ideals challenge the best thoughts of men. As we look down the lanes of the years, we are reminded that Thou didst give him a conscience void of offense, a strength equal to the burden, and a freedom which belongs to the sons of God. O may his fundamental concepts of life and government fill our hearts today, never looking with disdain upon any man, whether ignorant, poor, or black. Open our minds that we may share the spirit of him who preserved us a united people. Through a courageous devotion to our Republic, may we free our land from all teaching of atheism or any fruitage thereof, by whatever name. Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet, lest we forget. In Thy holy name we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday, February 10, 1947, was read and approved.

ANNOUNCEMENT

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to state at this time that today has been set aside for two anniversary speeches and, under the circumstances, feels that before the Chair will recognize gentlemen for 1-minute speeches or for permission to extend their remarks that this part of the program be carried out. The Chair, therefore, recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOWELL] to speak for 30 minutes.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, on this, the anniversary of his birth, I rise to speak of Abraham Lincoln, not as the sixteenth President of the United States and the Great Emancipator, but rather as a Member of the House of Representatives in the Thirtieth Congress, where he served 100 years ago for a single term as "the gentleman from the Seventh District of Illinois."

In all humility, and with knowledge of my own inability to find words adequate to express the high regard of the American people for Abraham Lincoln, I wish to devote a few minutes to the consideration of Lincoln, the Member of Congress.

Every American is acquainted with his story—from his humble birth of almost illiterate parents in an obscure log cabin in Kentucky on February 12, 1809, until his tragic death, from an assassin's bullet early on the morning of April 15, 1865, as a martyred President of the United States.

Penniless, and riding into town on a borrowed horse, Lincoln moved to Springfield, Ill., in the spring of 1837, to engage in the practice of law and to become a part of the then thriving city of 1,500 persons. Singularly, this day was April 15, 1837, when he was 28 years old. And 28 years from that very day, he was to breathe his last, in an obscure house across from Ford's Theater, in Washington, D. C.

The city of Springfield has justifiable pride in claiming Lincoln as its own. It was there that he gained his first reputation as a capable lawyer; there that he pursued a political career, even then aborning as a member of the state legislature; it was Springfield which sent him to this Congress, where in a brief 2 years he was to win his first stature of national proportions. It was Springfield that he called home because there was the only house that he ever owned—still standing today at Eighth and Jackson Streets.

It was there that he prepared his famous debates with Stephen A. Douglas on the question of slavery in the United States, eventually winning the Presidency in this Nation's darkest hour of civil division over how that question was to be settled.

And, finally, it has been at Springfield where for the last 82 years amid the beautifully shaded slopes of Oak Ridge Cemetery repose his mortal remains—resting in heavenly silence under a monument erected to him and dedicated to freedom-loving peoples everywhere.

As it has been said by more profound men—men who knew him intimately—Lincoln belongs to the ages.

It is well also to consider the words of Henry Ward Beecher spoken at the time of Lincoln's death:

Not Springfield's, but Illinois'; not Illinois', but the Nation's; not the Nation's, but the world's, is this man.

The gentleman from the Seventh Illinois District was elected on November 3, 1846, being then 37 years of age, over a powerful and skillful adversary named Peter Cartwright. Lincoln came to Congress as one of seven Members from Illinois; he was a Whig, the others were Democrats. His defeat of Cartwright was an accomplishment of considerable proportions because Cartwright was a seasoned campaigner and 24 years older than Lincoln. Cartwright, moreover, had the knack of mixing religion and politics, being an old-time preacher who often harangued his political audiences about sin. During the campaign Lincoln happened to attend one of these frontier meetings. Cartwright saw Lincoln in the audience and decided to make capital of his presence.

"All who desire to lead a new life, to give their hearts to God, and go to heaven, will stand," said Cartwright. Some of the audience stood, but not Lincoln. "All who do not wish to go to hell will stand," commented Cartwright. All stood up except one man. That man was Lincoln.

For further reference to this incident I quote the words of Carl Sandburg, noted Lincoln historian and writer:

"May I inquire of you, Mr. Lincoln," asked Cartwright, "where you are going?" And Lincoln slowly rose and slowly spoke. "I came here as a respectful listener. I did not know that I was to be singled out by Brother Cartwright. I believe in treating religious matters with due solemnity. I admit that the questions propounded by Brother Cartwright are of great importance. I did not feel called upon to answer as the rest did. Brother Cartwright asks me directly where I am going. I desire to reply with equal directness. I am going to Congress."

Cartwright was so uncompromising in his denunciation of Lincoln that he created ill feeling, not for Lincoln, but toward himself, thereby winning sympathy for the very man he was endeavoring to defeat. How many of us here today have not seen the same reaction in contemporary campaigns, where untruthful and vicious smears by the politically untried and unproven react only against themselves.

Then, as now, fabrications were spread in congressional campaigns. In one instance a campaign tale was repeated that Lincoln had a proud and aristocratic family which came often to visit him. To this Lincoln replied: "That sounds strange to me because I did not remember of but one who ever came to see me, and while he was in town he was accused of stealing a jew's-harp."

The Members of this Congress would be interested in this reported incident in connection with the campaign of 1846. His Whig supporters raised $200 for his campaign expenses, but after the election he returned all but 75 cents of it, with this statement:

I did not need the money. I made the canvass on my own horse; my entertainment, being at the houses of friends cost me nothing; and my only outlay was 75 cents for a barrel of cider, which some farm hands insisted I should treat to.

When the returns were in, Lincoln had polled 6,340 votes, and Cartwright had received 4,829, while a third candidate, an Abolitionist, had been given only 249. In those days, the Seventh District consisted of 11 counties, an area which now is divided among four districts—the Sixteenth, Seventeenth, Twentieth, and Twenty-first. Now, 100 years later, the district I am privileged to represent is the Twenty-first Illinois District, which includes the city of Springfield and county of Sangamon.

Although he was elected in November 1846, it was almost a year before Lincoln, together with his wife and family, moved to Washington. They took up residence early in December 1847, in the boarding house of Mrs. Sprigg, in Duff Green's row, near the present site of the Library of Congress.

When the Thirtieth Congress met on December 6, 1847, it is interesting to note that then as now the Speaker of the House of Representatives was from Massachusetts, the honorable Robert C. Winthrop. Mr. Winthrop became Speaker by a majority of one vote and Lincoln's vote thereby represented the margin of his victory.

The first session of that Congress adjourned on August 14, 1848; the second session began on December 4, 1848, and adjourned at 7 a. m. on March 4, 1849, having worked all night to complete its efforts.

The House, then as now, met at noon, although there were occasional evening sessions, starting at 5:30 p. m. There were 30 employees in the House, including the Clerk and Doorkeeper, as well as 14 pages, 31 messengers, and 3 laborers.

The Chamber itself was illuminated by gas fixtures with reflectors, and mention is made of 16 furnaces, although the type of fuel used was not identified.

Keen student that he was, Lincoln made the most of his brief term in Congress by studying the men around him, and these were a historic group, all great men. There was Daniel Webster; Horace Greeley, the editor, who was also a Member of the House; Andrew Johnson, destined to succeed Lincoln in the White House; Jefferson Davis, who was later to become President of the Confederacy; John Quincy Adams, the former President, then a Member of the House; John C. Calhoun; Lewis Cass; Thomas Benton—to name only a few.

It is singular that the Members of that Congress—the Thirtieth—were taken to task by Greeley's paper, the New York Tribune, for their mileage charges. The Tribune duly printed the charges of each Congressman. In Lincoln's case it was shown that the shortest mail-route distance between Springfield, Ill., and Washington, D. C., was 780 miles, but Lincoln had charged the Government $1,300.80. The Tribune estimated that Lincoln had overcharged the Government in the amount of $676.80.

Lincoln's mileage, relates Sandburg, was computed like that of most other Congressmen from the West, who assumed that the way to travel from the frontier sections was to go to Chicago, board a Great Lakes boat and ride on the Great Lakes to Buffalo and then finish the trip by coach or rail.

Lincoln found Congress very similar to the smaller-scale activities of the Illinois State Legislature. He was not long in making friends in the House, where he accustomed himself to a corner seat in the post office, which was a favorite meeting place for Members. There, it is related, he won early recognition as a champion story teller. A newspaperman of that time wrote:

> He never told a story twice, but appeared to have an endless repertoire ready, like the successive charges of a magazine gun.

But all was not storytelling for Lincoln while he was in Congress. He was one of the Members committed to the job of determining how the Federal Government would spend its $60,000,000 annually. At the time he took his oath of office the war between the United States and Mexico was in progress, a war which cost $27,000,000 and the lives of 27,000 soldiers.

Lincoln did not favor that war and openly attacked President Polk for having assertedly provoked it, a position which deeply offended his constituency.

From Springfield came gloomy letters written by his friend and law partner, Herndon, telling him of the ground he was losing and of his growing unpopularity because of his attitude on the Mexican War, and because of his so-called spot resolutions which catechized President Polk and his whole party. The war had been popular in many respects because it had added a great empire in the Southwest to the United States.

Despite his attitude toward the war, Lincoln supported measures to supply the armed forces, but he refused to change his opinion that the conflict was unfair and unjust.

Lincoln was not only a prolific letter writer, but he also was very meticulous about the revision of the speeches he delivered in Congress, carefully editing them before their release for publication in pamphlet form and for distribution among his constituents. Lincoln served on two committees—Post Offices and Post Roads, and Expenditures of the War Department.

From Congress, Lincoln took an active interest in the Presidential campaign of 1848, stumping in New England for Zachary Taylor for President in an effort to keep the Whig Party alive.

On January 10, 1849, Lincoln announced he would introduce a bill to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. The bill is described as "reasonable and moderate" by Lincoln historians, providing among other things for full-value recompense to owners of slaves freed under its proposals. But John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, issued his famous warning to the southern Members of Congress that the South knew what to expect "if it remained idle." He did not name Lincoln in this appeal, but referred to him as "the gentleman from Illinois."

According to agreement, Lincoln was to give up his seat in Congress at the end of a single term and after attending the Taylor inaugural in March 1849, he returned to Springfield. Back home, Lincoln quickly detected the resentment against him because of his stand on the Mexican War. Even Diller, the druggist, whom he had made postmaster, had deserted him for the Democrats.

Keenly disappointed, Lincoln sought appointment as Commissioner of the General Land Office, but was unsuccessful. Later, the administration offered him the appointment as Governor of the Territory of Oregon, which he was inclined to accept, deferring, however, to Mrs. Lincoln's objections.

Discouraged with politics, Lincoln, then only 40, returned to his impoverished law practice in Springfield and prepared for the greater destiny that fate was to decree for him.

While awaiting that destiny, he inspired the movement which created the Republican Party as the symbol of forthright government guaranteeing equal liberty and opportunity for all. Lincolnism and Republicanism became synonymous then; they remain synonymous today. Just as the people turned to Lincoln and the Republican Party in 1860 to avert internal disaster, so again have the American people in this day turned to the Republican Party and its leaders to direct and guide them as evidenced by the results of the congressional election of 1946.

I would be remiss if I neglected to draw an analogy between the national situation today and that of Lincoln's time by citing some of his more famous quotations. It is amazing how applicable many of them are to the current political scene.

Is it not proper and fitting that we of the Eightieth Congress should study his wisdom and philosophy in shaping the destinies of our beloved Nation today?

The greatest domestic issue in America today lies between labor and management and while we find Lincoln being quoted first by one side then by the other to sustain their position, it would be well for us to examine several expressions in order to determine as nearly as possible Abraham Lincoln's true philosophy.

It will be recalled that Lincoln made a famous reply to a contemporary Senator who was opposed to education for the laboring classes, asserting that cultivated society must rest upon an uneducated laboring class, just as a house rests upon its mud sills.

To this Lincoln replied:

> By the mud-sill theory, it is assumed that labor and education are incompatible, and any practical combination of them is impossible. According to that theory, a blind horse upon a treadmill is a perfect illustration of what a laborer should be—all the better for being blind that he could not kick understandingly. According to that theory, the education of laborers is not only useless but pernicious. In fact, it is in some sort deemed a misfortune that laborers have heads at all. Those same heads are regarded as explosive materials, only to be kept in damp places, as far as possible from that peculiar sort of fire which ignites them. A Yankee who could invent a strong-handed man without a head would receive the everlasting gratitude of the mud-sill advocates.

Thus we have one of his earliest public expressions embodying his broad sympathy and solicitude for the men and women of labor.

Later, in discussing the tariff question in 1847, Lincoln said:

Inasmuch as most good things are produced by labor, it follows that all such things of right belong to those whose labor produced them. But it has so happened, in all the ages of the world, that some have labored, and others have without labor enjoyed a large proportion of the fruits. This is wrong, and should not continue. To secure each laborer of the whole product of his labor, or as nearly possible, is the worthy subject of any good government.

This expression, though made in connection with the tariff question, was later expanded and clarified by Mr. Lincoln with reference to the right of people to engage in business free from government control and interference.

On July 27, 1848, Lincoln said in Congress:

We see it, and to us it appears like principle, and the best sort of principle at that—the principle of allowing the people to do as they please with their own business.

Ten years later in 1858, at Columbus, Ohio, Lincoln said:

We shall sooner have the fowl by hatching the egg than by smashing it.

Regarding the right and freedom of man to progress through the medium of his own industry and resourcefulness, he said in 1859 at Cincinnati:

The prudent penniless beginner in the world labors for wages a while, saves his surplus with which to buy tools or land for himself, then labors on his own account for another while, and at length hires another to help him. This is the just and generous and prosperous system which opens the way to all, gives hope to all, and consequently an improvement of condition to all.

Again in 1859, at Cincinnati, Lincoln said:

A man watches his pear tree day after day, impatient for the ripening of the fruit. Let him attempt to force the process and he will spoil both the fruit and tree. But let him patiently wait and the ripe pear at last falls into his lap.

In the same year, at Milwaukee, Wis., Lincoln said:

Property is the fruit of labor. * * * Property is desirable as a positive good in the world. * * * That some should be rich shows that others may become rich and hence is just encouragement to industry and enterprise.

The next year, in 1860, at New Haven, Conn., he said:

I like the system which lets a man quit when he wants to and wish it might prevail everywhere. * * * I take it that it is best for all to leave each man free, to acquire property as far as he can. Some will get wealthy. I don't believe in law to prevent a man from getting rich. It would do more harm than good. So while we may not propose any war upon capital, we do wish to allow the humblest man an equal chance to get rich with everybody else.

The obligation of respect for the fruits of the labor of others was clearly stated in 1864 when he said:

Let not him who is homeless pull down the house of another. * * * But let him work diligently and build one for himself. * * * Thus by example assuring that his own shall be safe from violence when built.

Most important in these times is Lincoln's conception of the proper exercise of Government control over the lives of individuals as well as their businesses as illustrated in this quotation of 1854:

In all that the people can individually do as well for themselves, Government ought not to interfere.

His great love for America, and his conception of the responsibility of everyone to preserve it along with its ideals of freedom was disclosed in 1861 when he said:

This country with its institutions belongs to the people who inhabit it. Whenever they shall grow weary of the existing Government, they can exercise their constitutional right of amending it, or their revolutionary right to dismember and overthrow it.

It is possible that this expression had its genesis in another made in 1838 in Springfield, Ill., when, in warning of the possibility of danger from within, he said:

At what point then is the danger to be expected? I answer, if it ever reaches us, it must spring up among us. It cannot come from abroad. If destruction is our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of free men, we must live through all time or die by suicide.

If the time ever comes in America when a minority can frustrate the will of the majority, the result will be mobocracy upon the one hand or tyranny on the other.

It is not for us to attempt to interpret these expressions of this great man, but rather to hear and consider them in the light of present-day conditions.

Think of the great depth and understanding of this man who, in his second inaugural address on March 4, 1865, advised his fellow men, as follows:

With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the Nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and orphan, and do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations.

His consideration was for all men and for all nations for all times, and therefore, I can conclude in no better way than to paraphrase Lincoln's own tribute to George Washington by saying:

To add brightness to the sun or glory to the name of Abraham Lincoln is alike impossible. Let none attempt it. In solemn awe we pronounce the name, and in its naked deathless splendor leave it shining on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DIRKSEN). Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'KONSKI] is recognized for 30 minutes.

THADDEUS KOSCIUSKO

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is most fitting and proper that on this day we honor the memory of Abraham Lincoln. February 12, however, is the birthday of another apostle of freedom, Thaddeus Kosciusko. Providence works in strange and devious ways. It is more than coincidence that Lincoln and Kosciusko—two outstanding champions of freedom from two different continents, and from two different generations—should be born on the same date.

Hence, while honoring the memory of Abraham Lincoln on this day, let us also honor the memory of Thaddeus Kosciusko—the heart, the blood, the spirit, and the inspiration of millions of Poles scattered throughout the globe. Today, more than ever, the name of Kosciusko is dear to the hearts of freedom-loving people the world over. Because today, like during the days of Kosciusko, Poland is the sad victim of betrayal by its friends—the memory of Kosciusko is heavy on all the hearts of Poland.

Providence directed that Lincoln and Kosciusko be born on the same date, even though more than a generation apart. Providence must have directed this because the two had everything in common. To both—freedom was their life work.

Lincoln emancipated the enslaved in America. Yet, long before that time Kosciusko gave of his possessions to buy freedom for the enslaved. It was with funds from Kosciusko's will that there was built the first trade school in America at Newark for Negroes.

Kosciusko came from Poland to America and for 6 years fought to create our Union. Lincoln more than a generation later fought to preserve that Union.

Whenever any nation anywhere in the world was threatened by dismemberment by bigger and corrupt neighbors—Kosciusko was always ready to help the unfortunate victims. Lincoln, as our President, by his force for good had always used his offices to protect the weak and small nations from their greedy and corrupt neighbors. To Lincoln and Kosciusko appeasement was the lowest form of betrayal.

Lincoln is known the world over for his philosophy that "a house divided against itself cannot stand." Kosciusko's philosophy went beyond that. His was the belief that a world divided against itself cannot stand. Lincoln believed that if freedom was in danger in one part of our Union, it was in danger all over the Union. Kosciusko believed that if freedom was in danger in one part of the world, it was in danger all over the world.

A close examination of the lives and works of Kosciusko and Lincoln will reveal their likeness and greatness in almost every respect. It is easy to see the hand of providence in that their birthdays come on the same date.

Mr. Speaker, I beg your indulgence in order that I might briefly review Kosciusko's contribution to the cause of freedom—freedom not only for Poland but our own freedom—and freedom for the world.

When our Union was engaged in the struggle that gave it birth in 1776, there came from a strange and far-away land a young man who gave his fortune and life to our cause. Then, like now, Poland was always a champion of freedom. Polish land, way back at that time, already was drenched with blood in its traditional fight for freedom. When the people of Poland heard of our struggle in 1776 they became gravely concerned. Every heart and every breast of Poland prayed for the Union's success. It was this universal wish among all of the people of Poland that sent Thaddeus Kosciusko to America to help us gain the freedom for which Poland on many occasions bled and died.

In the beginning things did not go so well in our Union's struggle for freedom. With justified pride Poles regard the role played by Kosciusko in the victory at Saratoga, a victory which won for America not only a battle but France's recognition of our independence. This was one of the turning points of the War for Independence.

In our Union's fight for freedom, the question of the defense of the Hudson had been of paramount importance. Kosciusko was assigned that responsibility. He chose West Point for its commanding position. Little is now left of the fortifications, but the monument erected to his memory by American youth will remain a grateful tribute forever. That America today can regard West Point with pride is, in large measure, due to Kosciusko, who first suggested for a national military school the spot where it now stands.

In the summer of 1780, Kosciusko was transferred to the South. Here he saw the Negroes at close quarters and was brought face to face with the Negroes in slavery. It was then that, with his keen susceptibility to every form of human suffering, he acquired that profound sympathy for the American Negro, which 17 years later was to dictate his parting testament to the New World.

Kosciusko was present through the whole campaign of the Carolinas and was regarded with strong affection and admiration by General Greene. When the campaign changed to one of guerrilla warfare, he fought as a soldier, not as an engineer. At length Charleston fell, and on December 14, 1782, the American Army entered the town in a triumphal procession, in which Kosciusko rode with his fellow officers, greeted by the populace with flowers and cries of "Welcome."

Peace soon followed. Our Union was born. Kosciusko helped give our Union its birth. The prayers of the people of Poland were answered. America was free. Poland, a country to whom freedom means more than life, helped make our Nation free.

Kosciusko had fought for 6 years in the American Army. Nathaniel Greene best sums up what the Pole had done for America and what he had been to his brother soldiers:

Colonel Kosciusko belonged—

to the number of my most useful and dearest comrades in arms. I can liken to nothing his zeal in the public service, and in the solution of important problems nothing could have been more helpful than his judgment, vigilance, and diligence. He was fearless of every danger. He never manifested desires or claims to himself, and never let the opportunity pass of calling attention to and recommending the merits of others.

Congress, in 1783, belatedly conferred upon Kosciusko the rank of brigadier general with an acknowledgment of its high sense of his long, faithful, and meritorious service.

In the fall of 1784, Kosciusko returned to his native country. For the next 12 years he remained in Europe—through the infamous partitions of Poland and the many battles fought in connection therewith. It was in 1794 that Kosciusko was seriously wounded in battle and was taken prisoner by Russia, not to be released until 2 years later. Then, like now, Poland became the prey of the Muscovite Bear—while the rest of the world looked the other way. Then, like now, Poland was the pawn of hypocrites and betrayers.

Wounded, sick at heart and body, on the 19th of December 1796, Kosciusko left St. Petersburg to go back to America. In good time he arrived in Stockholm, where he was greeted with enthusiasm. Later, Kosciusko embarked and after a 3 weeks' passage landed in London.

The Gentlemen's Magazine announced: "Kosciusko, the hero of freedom, is here."

The whole of London made haste to visit him. Politicians, men of letters, and the rulers of fashion, all alike thronged to his rooms. To Walter Savage Landor, then a mere youth, the sight of Kosciusko awakened a sympathy for Poland that he never lost, and to which English literature owes one of his Imaginary Conversations. More than half a century later he looked back to the moment in which he spoke to Kosciusko as the happiest of his life. The Whig Club presented Kosciusko with a sword of honor; the Duchess of Devonshire pressed upon him a costly ring, which went the way of most of the gifts that Kosciusko received—he passed them on to his friends. Tokens of admiration had counted for nought in Kosciusko's life. They were the merest baubles to him who had seen his own country fall. In the portrait that without his knowledge Cosway painted, we see him lie with bandaged head in an attitude of deep and sorrowful musing—for his native Poland.

Bristol was at that time the English port for sailing to America and it was there that, after a fortnight's stay in London, Kosciusko betook himself. He found in Bristol old friends of American days, and now was the guest of one of them, at that time United States consul. A guard of honor received him, processions of the townsfolk flocked to catch a glimpse of the hero, a military band played every evening before the consulate, and he received as the gift of the city a handsome silver service. One who visited him here records his impression of a soul unbroken by misfortune, by wounds, poverty, and exile.

The journey down the Avon to where Kosciusko's ship lay at anchor was a triumphal progress. He was accompanied by English officers in full dress, by the American consul, and hosts of well-wishers. All heads were bared as he was carried on board. The whole length of the river handkerchiefs were waved from the banks. Farewell resounded from every rock and promontory, where spectators had crowded to see the last of the Polish hero. Boats shot out from the private dwellings on the waterside, laden with flowers and fruits for the departing guest. Not a few men and women boarded the ship and accompanied Kosciusko for some distance before they could bring themselves to part with him.

The ship had sailed on June 18, 1797. For 2 months Kosciusko and his Polish companions tossed on the Atlantic, on one occasion near shipwreck. Philadelphia, their destination, they reached on August 18, 1797. Claypole's Advertiser for August 19, 1797, reported:

In the ship Adriana, Captain Lee, arrived here last evening, from Bristol, came passenger, that illustrious defender of the rights of mankind, the brave but unfortunate Kosciusko, the Polish general. On his landing he was received with three cheers. And, as a further mark of popular respect for this great character, the citizens insisted upon drawing him to his lodgings. The general appears to be in good spirits, but has suffered very materially from his wounds and inhuman imprisonment. We trust, however, he will long live to enjoy in these peaceful shores, that liberty and happiness which he assisted in fighting for, but which he fought in vain to obtain for his native land.

Eight days later Washington, from Mount Vernon, congratulated Kosciusko on his safe arrival and welcomed him to the land whose liberties he had been instrumental in establishing.

No one—

Said Washington—

has a higher respect and veneration for your character than I have, and no one more sincerely wished, during your arduous struggle in the cause of liberty in your country, that it might be crowned with success. But the ways of providence are inscrutable and mortals must submit. I pray you to believe that at all times, and under all circumstances, it would make me happy to see you at my last retreat, from which I never expect to be more than 20 miles.

Kosciusko was, however, never able to visit his commander at Mount Vernon.

At this time Kosciusko drew into great intimacy with Thomas Jefferson, at that time Secretary of State. Jefferson wrote to Gates:

I see Kosciusko often. He is the purest son of liberty among you all that I have ever known.

Sometime in March 1798 a packet of letters from Europe was handed to Kosciusko. His emotion on reading the contents was so strong that, despite his crippled condition, he sprang from his couch and stepped without a helping hand to the middle of the room. "I must return at once to Europe," he said. At that time he received news that Poland was again being massacred. Before leaving America he gave Jefferson his power of attorney and wrote out the will in which more than half a century before the Civil War the Polish patriot advanced the cause of emancipation:

I, Thaddeus Kosciusko, being just in departure from America, do hereby declare and direct that my friend Thomas Jefferson employ the whole thereof in purchasing Negroes from among his own as any others and giving them liberty in my name, in giving them an education in trades and otherwise, and in having them instructed for their new condition in the duties of morality which may make them good neighbors, good fathers or mothers, husbands or wives, and in their duties as citizens, teaching them to be defenders of their liberty and country, and of the good order of society and in whatsoever may make them happy and useful, and I make the said Thomas Jefferson my executor of this.

T. KOSCIUSKO,
5th Day of May 1798.

By the end of June or early in July 1798, Kosciusko reached Paris. His arrival centered upon him the gaze of the whole world. Sympathy with himself and the Polish cause he heard expressed upon all sides. He negotiated at length with the Government of France for France's help in the restoration of Polish independence. This was promised him many times, but his cautious request for guaranties was never complied with. Then, like now, Poland was betrayed by its friends and used as a pawn to gain temporary peace, expediency, and advantage.

But Kosciusko's intercourse with his American friends did not slacken. In 1800, at Paris, at the request of Gen. William R. Davies, then envoy from the United States to France, Kosciusko prepared in French his Manoeuvres of Horse Artillery, and it was published. General Davies requested the United States Military Philosophical Society at West Point to have the manual translated and published. This was done in the same year, and Colonel Williams, the translator, presented President Jefferson with a copy of this work, the first upon its subject to be published in America and used for many years as a basic text in our country.

Napoleon was now big man of Europe. In 1806, from Berlin, he summoned Kosciusko to assume the leadership of the revolting Poles. But the former Polish commander in chief had little faith in the fortune of the Emperor and none in his promises. He declined to obey the call and remained in Paris. He refused to use Poland as a pawn to promote a dictator. He refused to bargain his honor and the honor of his native Poland. Appeasement hypocrisy was not part of his life.

In May 1815 Russia, Austria, and Prussia signed an agreement for a new partition of Poland, just like they did at Yalta. An autonomous Kingdom of Poland was to be formed with the Czar as King, but it would be but a small part of the true Poland. Kosciusko heard these things. In dismay, he wrote to the Czar. In vain he waited for an answer. Kosciusko refused all offers of office and honor in the newly partitioned Poland—now a puppet of the Czar. He felt that his very presence, even, would lend sanction to the new partition. He despised puppets and quislings. He chose, therefore, a voluntary exile among the Swiss.

In serene communion with nature, among eternal mountains, in unceasing meditation upon the future of Poland, he spent the two last years of his life. And here, on the sad autumn evening of October 15, 1817, far from his fatherland, though close in spirit, among strangers, with not a Polish face nor a Polish word to gladden his heart, Kosciusko died. Even in his loneliness he was faithful to Poland—her purest soul and the greatest of Poles. And his greatness in that it was not his own personal greatness; merely, it was the greatness of Poland.

Mr. Speaker, the greatness of Kosciusko is the greatness of Poland. The spirit of Kosciusko has always been the spirit of Poland. Wherever freedom needs a friend there you will always find Poland the first to bleed and suffer. No soil of any nation the world over is so saturated with blood gashed for freedom as it is in Poland. There in that land at all times freedom had a loyal and trusting friend. Kosciusko is dead—but his spirit still guides Poland and its people.

Let us go back just a few years to 1938 and 1939. The whole world was afraid of a little paperhanger from Austria, then the big man of Europe. I remember at that time even in our own country when I denounced the leader of the "master race," I was told I should temper my words because Adolf might get mad at us. Among all the nations of the world there was no voice courageous enough to even call Adolf Schickelgruber a bad name. The leaders of the world licked the boots of the tyrant. They went to Munich. Chamberlain even took an umbrella with him, hoping that he might get the privilege and high honor of protecting the paperhanger from the rain. Shaking in their boots the powers of Europe appeased and fought for the favors of the big man of Europe. Even the mighty Red Bear of Russia embraced the madman of Europe and plotted with him the murder of small and helpless people of small and helpless nations.

In all the world during these tragic years, 1938 and 1939, there was only one nation and one people courageous enough to call the paperhanger's bluff. True to the spirit of Kosciusko, the people of Poland said, "We care not what course other nations take, but as for us we shall stand up and fight. The cause of freedom is at stake. We would rather fight and die for that freedom than lick the boots of any tyrant."

How courageously the people of Poland fought is written in the records of the past 7 years. To the last man, woman, and child they stood up. In the long struggle ahead—6 years—there could not be found in Poland a single quisling. The spirit of Kosciusko was prevalent in the hearts, minds, and breasts of every single Pole—fighting and dying for their freedom, as well as ours.

Meeting the mightiest military power in all history, they fought on. Alone they bore the brunt of the killers of Europe. After 19 days of glorious resistance, they were stabbed in the back by one of Hitler's pals—the bear of Russia. The bank robber of Georgia—not a Russian—and the paperhanger of Austria—not a German—were now butchering and dividing the spoils and carcass of prostrate Poland. Now Poland was attacked from both sides by two of the mightiest powers the world had ever known. Still they fought on. Still the spirit of Kosciusko urged them on. Never in the history of mankind has there been such an exhibition of glorious courage and resistance. Poland did not get lend-lease to spur on their courage. The spirit of Kosciusko was all the inspiration these people needed.

As Members of Congress we know the story full well. Poland was not a warring nation. All they had to offer was courage, life and blood. But that was not enough to stop the bank robber of Georgia and the paperhanger from Austria. Poland was overrun and destroyed. The paperhanger enslaved the Poles in the west in labor and concentration camps and the bank robber from Georgia took the Poles from the east and sent them to Siberia.

But it takes more than murder to destroy the spirit of Poland which is the spirit of Kosciusko. Enslaved and betrayed by the rest of the world Poland still fought on. They fought harder and longer than any of the Allies of this war. A few months after Poland fell, a Polish Army was fighting in France in the Maginot line. When mighty France folded up, the Poles were the last to lay down their arms in the Maginot line. From there the Poles went to England. Six months after Poland fell 12,000 Polish boys were flying in the British Royal Air Force. They shot down one out of every five planes during the London blitz. One of the Polish squadrons was name the Kosciusko Squadron.

The only help the Allies sent Norway was a small contingent of Polish boys and what was left of the Polish Navy. All this after Poland was destroyed and overtaken by the Red and Brown Fascists of Europe. By now Hitler was running wild in Africa. It was a group of Polish boys that gave Hitler his first defeat at Tobruk. This after Poland had been overrun. This Polish Air Force helped in the evacuation at Dunkerque. So did what was left of the Polish Navy. The spirit of Kosciusko will never be destroyed, nor will the spirit of Poland.

What American is there who does not remember the deadly battle of Monte Cassino Hill? It was a Polish general and a Polish Army that captured that murderous fortification and paved the road for the Allies on their march to Rome. Nor did Poland refuse to play a part in the invasion of Normandy. Side by side with the Allies Polish forces marched through France, Holland, Belgium into Germany. Never in the annals of history have so few done so much for the cause of freedom and humanity. Wherever there was a fight there you found Poland. The first to resist—the first to be destroyed—yet out of the ashes of that destruction Poland contributed manpower for the air forces exceeded only by the United States and England. The first to resist and the first to be destroyed—yet Poland provided fighting troops in an amount larger than all the nations combined outside the United States, the British Empire, and Russia.

If all this were all it would be more than enough. But the people who stayed in Poland—what part did they play? True to the spirit of Kosciusko the people of Poland organized the largest and most effective underground in Europe. Every Polish man, woman, and child was a part of that underground. The Polish underground was the most effective weapon the Allies had in their march through Europe. In one uprising—the Warsaw uprising—alone, in August of 1944, 250,000 Polish men, women, and children laid down their lives. Even though betrayed by its own allies, the underground fought on. With true Kosciusko spirit they had faith in Almighty God.

The courage and the sacrifice by Poland in this last war has no parallel in the annals of history. More than 8,000,000 of her people gave their lives. That comprises almost one-fourth of her population. When in the annals of man has any nation paid so high a price for freedom? If Kosciusko were alive today he would be proud of his native land and its people, to whom freedom means more than life, and to whom freedom is so priceless that it can never be compromised.

But I am sad to say that there is one thing Kosciusko would not be proud of. I might also say that there is one thing Lincoln would not be proud of. I might add that there is one thing that decent people the world over are not proud of. It is the shameful and unprecedented betrayal of a brave and a gallant people by its own allies.

Poland has had a sad history. It was dismembered time and again. Three times before the nineteenth century—the fourth time by a bank robber and a paperhanger in fateful September 1939. But these partitions were by enemies. That is to be expected and endured. If you, as a person, are robbed by your enemies, it is sad but understandable. However, when you get robbed by your own brother or sister, that is hard to understand, let alone endure. Yet that is what happened to Poland. It was partitioned by its brothers and enslaved by its brothers, as a result of the crime of Yalta. What a shameful reward to a brave and gallant people—a people that gave us a Kosciusko and a people who gave 8,000,000 dead for the same cause for which we gave more than 300,000 dead:

Oh feeble statesmen,
Oh ignominious times
That lick the tyrants' feet,
And smile upon his crimes.

Shame on us! Shame on Britain! Shame upon the world for such cowardly appeasement. Shades of Munich! Shades of Chamberlain! But Munich is a Sunday-school picnic compared to Yalta, and Chamberlain a Sunday-school teacher compared to the big men of Yalta. I say Yalta will go down in history as worse than Munich and its conspirators worse than Chamberlains.

What did Poland ask for its sacrifice? Did they ask for four or seven billion dollars from American taxpayers? No! Did they ask for the atom bomb? No! Did they ask for us to ever bail them out and rebuild Poland? No! Poland did not even ask for bread.

Then what did Poland ask? They merely asked for their own land and their own government. In the name of truth, mercy, and freedom Poland had a right to expect that simple and honorable request to be fulfilled. But the answer Poland received from one of the White House "palace guards" was, "You Poles are just like the Irish; you are never satisfied."

So lo and behold—all this gallant blood of Poland was gashed in vain—because Poland by the acts of greedy and power-hungry men of Yalta—lies prostrate again. But mark you fellow countrymen—Poland is not this sad drama's closing act. It's tragic curtain will rise anew again and again. On Poland's gashed breast today the beast of Red Fascism plants his hunger and consults what nation's breast shall next be gored. This is just the beginning. There will be more and more stupendous slaughters of the free.

To gallant Poland we can well say—as other nations fall one by one—then and only then will they know what it means to be betrayed like Poland was betrayed. When these nations fall one by one they will miss Poland. As they fall one by one and plead for mercy on bended knee—then and only then will they understand the glory that belongs to Poland.

To you Members of Congress—the elected custodians of America—I wish to warn that the fall of the Polish eagle, caused by betrayal, is big with fate to man. If the new world is to begin by a broken word, it would be better not to be born. Our own strife is coming. You cannot sell out the freedom of your friends and neighbors and keep your own secure. The beast of red fascism from the ashes and blood-soaked soil of betrayed Poland shall forge the fetters and fate of our sons yet unborn. It will not be a kind fate. It will be a hideous, murderous, and shrieking fate. Today its Poland—tomorrow it will be another—after that another, one by one, and us, too. It is nearer than you think. Someday and soon the world will understand the words, "Poland's setting star is the world's disaster-rising morn."

In conclusion, Poland, the world will someday mind how you bore the brunt of fate and how you bled for humankind. Poland, so hallowedly have you played your part that freedom-loving people everywhere have your name written on their heart. Poland, your sorrow in nobility transcends. Your conquerors' and betrayers' joy make their own cheeks blush. But shame never has and never will tinge the cheeks of Poland. Thank God that Poland never has and never will change her conscience, cause, and name for all the wealth and all that goes with a felon fame.

EXTEMPORE

Poland might be dead for a while. Poland has died before. But the spirit of Poland has never died and never will die. Because Poland is the spirit of Kosciusko—even after suffering defeat in victory—the spirit of Kosciusko shall make Poland rise again and live again as it has before. Why do I say that?

I say Poland will arise and live again, because the Polish people have a patriot's spirit, an unconquerable spirit. Just a few days ago, for instance, 50 young Polish orphans left India for the United States to seek haven in various convents in America. When they boarded the ship in India, in unison they sang, "Jescie Polska nie Zginela," which means Poland is not yet lost. All the orphans of Poland, morning, noon, and night sing in their hearts "Jescie Polska nie Zginela." There are 250,000 Polish troops who bled all over the world for their freedom and ours. They are now in the beet fields of Canada and in the mines of England, but morning, noon, and night they sing "Jescie Polska nie Zginela." There are 12,000 gallant Polish airmen scattered over the four corners of the world without a country and without a home, and morning, noon, and night they sing "Jescie Polska nie Zginela." There are 6,000,000 Poles in America, proud and happy citizens of our own native land, yet morning, noon, and night they sing "Jescie Polska nie Zginela." There are 25,000,000 Polish people being tortured under the heel of Red fascism in Europe, but morning, noon, and night in their hearts and minds are the words of the immortal Polish song "Jescie Polska nie Zginela." That is the spirit of Poland; that is the spirit of Kosciusko. It is an unconquerable spirit that will never die.

I say that Poland will arise and live again, because they have a profound affection for their native land. I might mention that it is an old custom in Poland that when a citizen leaves that country, his last deed is to pick up a bit of Polish soil to take with him so that it can be buried with him in case he never returns to Poland. Such profound affection for a native land is unique among all people of the world.

I say Poland will arise and live again, because the Polish people everywhere have an abounding faith in Almighty God. You can steal their country and the Poles will be sad, but they will sing and pray "There is a God." You can murder their loved ones, but the Poles will sing and pray "There is a God." You can destroy every last segment of their nation, and the Poles will pray and sing "There is a God."

With the immortal spirit of Kosciusko, with profound and everlasting love for their country, and with an abounding faith in Almighty God, Poland will arise again, and live again, and be forever free.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, America today joins with the friends of a free Poland in paying tribute to Gen. Thaddeus Kosciusko, Polish soldier and patriot, gallant American officer, and friend of true freedom. His name will ever remain a symbol of the struggle of man against the forces of oppression.

Thomas Jefferson, as Secretary of State, wrote of him:

> I see Kosciusko often. He is the purest son of liberty among you that I have ever known; the kind of liberty which extends to all—not only the rich.

His ideals are perhaps most effectively set forth in the Constitution of Poland, adopted on May 3, 1791. The principles therein contained are comparable to those of the Magna Carta and our own Declaration of Independence. They are more than a rule of action for the Poland of that day. The constitutional ideals set up in the document have almost an exact counterpart in the rules of political action defined in the Constitution of the United States, the supreme law of our land.

Kosciusko believed in the dignity of his fellow man and fought throughout his life for tolerance and humanitarianism.

The four freedoms of the Atlantic Charter may well have been the ideals of this great Polish leader. Rule by majority, secret ballot at public elections, and freedom of religion are fundamental truths upon which democracy rests. The life of Kosciusko exemplified that principle enunciated in the Constitution of Poland, adopted as it was a few short years after his return to his native land from America—the Nation he had served with distinction for 6 years, won the rank of brigadier general, and was voted the thanks of Congress:

The same holy religion commands us to love our neighbors. We, therefore, owe to all people of whatever persuasion peace in matters of faith and protection of government; consequently we assure to all persuasions and religions, freedom and liberty, according to the laws of the country in all dominions of the republic.

The present plight of Poland would have saddened the heart and soul of the great Polish patriot whose memory we honor today. Suffering immeasurable material destruction because of the unwillingness of the people of Poland to bow their heads before the forces of oppression and tyranny, Poland today operates under a government which it tolerates and wherein the ordinary citizen cannot say he is the captain of his soul. A nation is as great as her individual citizens are untrammeled and free from despotic interference and totalitarian rule. Freedom of speech, supplemented by the exercise of the natural right of every man under a democratic form of government to choose his leader at a secret election, without undue or unfair influence which makes impossible a true expression of the will of the people, is a condition precedent to national greatness.

At Yalta 2 years ago it was agreed that the people of Poland, once liberated, must have a chance to choose their own government in a free election. Last month Poland had its election. Reportedly, any resemblance to a free and democratic election was absent. Foreign correspondents have written that terrorism was so transparent that the result was never in doubt. The Communist Party demanded that its adherents display their ballots. Few voters had courage to express free choice in the face of such intimidation. Our Government has protested that Poland failed to carry out its solemn pledge of a free election. So did Great Britain. Russia remained silent.

President Harry S. Truman uniquely and justifiably made known to the new Ambassador from the present Republic of Poland that broken promises are as indefensible in international relationships as in everyday dealings in the social and economic life of the individual. International pledges are made to be fulfilled. Double dealing by any member of the family of nations with any other member is contrary to every true principle of democracy. Our great President has expressed in his rebuke the thought of millions of Americans. We believe in free elections, untrammeled by undemocratic leaders and undominated by the enemies of those principles of democratic conduct which are necessary for the peace of the world.

Kosciusko gave his life for the freedom and happiness of man. His teachings never wavered from his belief that the dignity of man would prevail over the forces of tryanny.

It is perhaps coincidence that America today also celebrates the anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, great American, great humanitarian, who, as Kosciusko, believed in human liberty. "With malice toward none, with charity for all" he too followed the star of freedom and justice for all men, however great, however small, in the realization that peace and happiness can never exist in a world where slavery exists. As Kosciusko, his life was dedicated to the cause of liberty for man, irrespective of race, creed, or color. They both followed the pathway that leads to human brotherhood, convinced that all men are created equal. Lincoln gave the world a democratic concept of the dignity of man. Kosciusko, with an enduring faith that right makes might, lived according to the light of justice, as he understood it.

The glory of Kosciusko was the glory of Poland. The valor of his spirit is the courage of her struggle through the centuries. America will never forget the heroic efforts of this great Polish warrior in the battle of this country for freedom. His life, dedicated as it was against bitterness and hatreds, sought but one reward "to plant the flower of freedom where he thought the flower would grow, and to live to pluck the fragrant blossoms of liberty for God and his fellow man."

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, there could hardly be a more fitting occasion for reviewing the moral obligations of the American people toward the people of Poland than the birthday anniversary of Thaddeus Kosciusko, who symbolizes in the mind of every American the magnificent fulfillment of every moral obligation every people on the earth has toward every freedom-loving people.

Thaddeus Kosciusko came to these shores in order to help our revolutionary leaders to establish freedom and independence of the American people. He succeeded in his endeavor but he did not succeed in an effort to free his own people from the Russian yoke. He was defeated by an overwhelming force, but he fought in his own country for the same ideals he fought for in our country. There was no difference at that time, as there is no difference now, between what the peoples of the United States and of Poland are striving for. Freedom—and by that I mean both freedom for individuals and freedom for a nation—is what the Poles want as much as we do.

While this last unprecedented war was being fought, the war which started in Poland and for Poland's freedom, while our soldiers were dying in foreign lands alongside their comrades in arms of the Polish Army—words of praise and encouragement were heaped on the Polish nation from all quarters. Pledges were made and in this country the name of Thaddeus Kosciusko was always mentioned whenever we pledged our support for the fighting nation of Poland.

The Polish Nation took our pledges very much to their hearts. They believed and they kept on fighting, suffering, and dying. The nation first to fight paid most dearly, and, as you all know, the numbers of war casualties, victims of persecution, deportations, and mass starvation are unbelievably high as far as Poland is concerned.

When the war was finished, however, when victory crowned our efforts and sacrifices, when our boys could return home to live in peace in a free country, when we proclaimed that antidemocratic, totalitarian forces were defeated, when we declared that we put an end to willful imperialism and oppression—the Poles had to find out that they emerged from the war a defeated nation, despite the fact that they were throughout the war the most praised and most faithful member of a victorious team.

I want to commend our State Department for having courageously admitted that the elections held in Poland recently were nothing else but a shameless fake. I want to commend our President for the way he received the mock ambassador of Poland, sent to Washington by usurpers of Poland's sovereignty and oppressors of the Polish Nation. But I cannot think for a moment that after having indicted the so-called Polish Government of breach of faith and violation of treaties, we will rest the case. I am sure that this is not the intention of our State Department and that the Polish case, temporarily closed at Yalta and Potsdam, will be reopened soon in its entirety.

We have a powerful new institution, a parliament of the world—and by that I mean the United Nations—where the case of Poland, with all its implications, including the conduct of Soviet Russia and the role played by Soviet Russia in the recent developments in Poland, should be freely debated. I am sure that the United States Government and the Government of Great Britain, as cosignatories of the now admittedly broken Yalta agreement, will not delay the submission of the case of Poland to the United Nations, with the request for speedy and efficient action. Thus continuing the work that General Kosciusko was striving for in seeking the deliverance and establishing freedom and independence to all peoples of the world.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, today we celebrate the birthdays of two great men, Abraham Lincoln and Thaddeus Kosciusko. These two great leaders need no eulogies from me, as history gives them all the honors they deserve.

As they both fought for the freedom of people, I think it most fitting at this time that once again I call to your attention the deplorable conditions under which Poland exists today.

America must listen to this cry from the core of the hearts of that civilized nation. We cannot close our ears to it. It is a cry for life.

Polish patriots fought that our Constitution might come into existence; now it is proper that we, as a nation, demand that the United Nations Organization restore to Poland its freedom and independence.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to announce that he will be absent tomorrow and designates the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] as the Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] is recognized for 30 minutes.

EXPORTATION OF SUGAR

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have this day introduced a bill to prohibit the exportation of sugar, such exportation of sugar of the United States to be prohibited after May 1, 1947. The bill provides for a penalty of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, for violation of the provisions of this bill, in the event that it becomes law.

I want to call attention to the fact that the exportation of sugar is causing two groups much distress. I refer to the housewives, who are short of sugar throughout the country. There is hardly a section of the country where sugar is not required for canning purposes and already the season is about to open in some parts of the United States, and the season for canning will continue in other parts as the winter recedes.

The other group to which I refer is the small candy manufacturers.

On January 2, 1947, I wrote to the Department of Agriculture, Sugar Division, with reference to the sugar situation as it related to commercial frozen fruits, home canning, and sugar for export. One paragraph of that letter from the Department of Agriculture is typical. I shall read two lines of the paragraph relating to sugar for housewives for canning:

> Unfortunately it did not appear feasible to undertake a special program for supplying sugar to housewives for canning during 1946. As you know, the field staff of the OPA was reduced to such an extent that that agency concluded it could not administer a special program for home canning.

I wish to say that the bill which I am introducing will not interfere with the shipment of sugar required by our Army abroad, nor will it violate any agreements already entered into with reference to foreign shipments of sugar.

It would be interesting to know if the sugar which the Administration is shipping abroad is a part of the candy which we are importing from foreign countries. The figures on importations of candy from abroad are quite startling. For example, in 1941, 1,100,000 pounds of candy were imported—in 1945, 65,575,000 pounds were imported. I for one do not favor the closing down of our candy shops and factories here in order to transfer our domestic trade to the foreign producers of candy.

With the present plan of the administration to lower the duty to let more candy, as well as other competing products, into this country our candy establishments are likely to all close down. The irony of it all is that we deprive our own candy manufacturers of the sugar, and send it abroad to help ruin our domestic industry.

It is my hope that the House will give consideration to this bill to the end that our own people may be treated fairly who wish to process food and thus save it from destruction.

I invite the cooperation of the House in seeing that immediate action is taken on this bill.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN AND THADDEUS KOSCIUSKO

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, America today pays tribute to two great men, Abraham Lincoln and Thaddeus Kosciusko.

Others will review the achievements of Lincoln in addresses throughout our great Nation. I take the floor this afternoon in tribute to Kosciusko, Polish soldier and patriot, who became an officer in America's first Army and aided our founding fathers in their struggle to make the Colonies an independent nation.

Two hundred years have failed to dim the luster of Kosciusko's glory, achieved in the cause of freedom. He brought from his native land of Poland a military skill which he placed at the disposal of General Washington for six long years. He contributed so much to the success of the American Revolution that when his work was done he returned to Poland carrying with him a vote of thanks of Congress.

Kosciusko's name will live forever—symbolic of the struggle of man against the forces of oppression. His name means to the world emancipation from human bondage. It is fitting that on this anniversary of his birth we should think of him—honor the memory of a valiant hero and stanch defender of the ideals of liberty and justice, not only for Poland but for all mankind.

Others came from Poland in those days of trial for the colonists—indicating that over 200 years ago there burned in the hearts of the Polish people that same love for freedom that remains alive today.

The Polish people know oppression—have known it for many centuries. On this anniversary of the birth of one of their great men whose friendship for America helped to relieve her from oppression, it is fitting today to give some thought to the plight of Poland.

America has always befriended the small nations of the world. To Poland we owe a lasting debt of gratitude; first, because it is the land of some of our earliest benefactors; second, because it was brave Poland that first accepted the challenge of Hitler. For her heroism shall Poland be partitioned; shall her government be made the puppet of a stronger nation whose ideologies are so foreign to the Christian beliefs of the Polish people?

We should have some concern for Poland's welfare, just as Kosciusko and other Polish patriots had concern for America. We cannot follow the happenings in Poland today without coming to the very definite realization that the U. S. S. R. is doing some very questionable things. Russia has taken over the economies of all central Europe and America must face the ugly fact that the U. S. S. R., in violation of agreements made with her wartime allies, is spreading the tentacles of sovietism over unprotected and unwilling people.

A great Christian people like the Poles will never accept the Godless political or social philosophy of the Soviet. There can be no peace in Europe, or in the world when one people try to force upon another ideologies in which they have no faith.

Our Government cannot ignore and, of course, it has not ignored the attempts to perpetuate a puppet government in Poland. President Truman only a few days ago delivered to the new Polish Ambassador a scathing denunciation of the manner in which the recent Polish elections were held and made it clear that America does not feel that provisions of the agreement between the war allies has been followed.

America should be unyielding in its protest against the Soviet-influenced election in Poland.

Liberty is slowly bleeding to death in prostrate Poland. Countless thousands of Poles have been victims of political murders or exiled. Through former Secretary of State Byrnes, America has voiced its disapproval of these persecutions.

The fraudulent Polish elections are a warning of eventual Soviet annexation of all Europe by employment of similar methods unless stern and effective measures are adopted by the United Nations.

The flagrant violation of even the meager obligation of holding free elections in Poland, as guaranteed by the Yalta agreement, raises doubt in the United States concerning the sanctity of Russian pledges. These dishonest elections are aimed at the complete enslavement of the Polish nation.

I have repeatedly stated that the future holds no hope for a lasting peace unless the nations of the world can arrive at mutual understanding. How are we to expect such if one of the great powers holds so lightly agreements made in conference? However it is done, the Soviet must be brought to realize that their attempted domination of Europe must be curbed if a way to lasting peace is ever to be found.

Sacred pledges were made by the victorious United Nations at Yalta and at Potsdam guaranteeing freedom and personal security in life and property to all peoples in all lands. Russia was a participant in these conferences. She assumed obligations by agreements concurred in by the United Nations. If the Soviets do not choose to honor these agreements, they leave the world with serious doubt as to their future course.

As a nation dedicated to freedom—recognizing the blessings of liberty as we do—America should continue to exhibit the liveliest concern in the welfare of Poland and all small nations who were given such hope by the Atlantic Charter. America's great weight must be thrown behind the fight of all true Poles for a truly free Poland.

AMENDMENTS TO SOCIAL-SECURITY LAW

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing two amendments to the old-age and survivors insurance section of our social-security law. These amendments, if enacted, will bring old-age and survivor benefits to the self-employed and to State and municipal employees.

This title of the social-security law refers to old-age-retirement and death-benefit provisions of the program. The insured individual has a social-security number and there is taken from his wages a tax which at the present is 1 percent. A like amount is contributed by his employer. In order for an individual to have an old-age annuity under the social-security program, he must have been under the program for one-half of the time since 1937, or 40 quarters.

For instance, if an individual whose average wage was $100 per month, were covered by the program for 40 quarters, and retired at the age of 65, he would receive a monthly benefit of $27.50 for the rest of his life. When his wife reached the age of 65, even though she was not covered by the program, she would receive a monthly check of $13.75.

If an individual dies, who has been under social security for one-half of the time in the last 12 quarters preceding his death, his survivors would be paid certain benefits. If his average wage was $100 per month, and he left a minor child, that child would receive $13.75 per month until he was 18. During the minority of this child, the mother would be paid $20.63 per month. When the last child reached 18, the widow would receive no more benefits until she reached age 65 and then her payment of $20.63 per month would be resumed.

At the present time, the men and women who are employed by a State or any of its subdivisions such as counties, parishes, towns, cities, school districts, public-power and irrigation districts, drainage districts, or other municipalities, are not included in our Federal social-security program. These employees face the same problems of old age as other citizens. They are performing services as clerks, bookkeepers, typists, janitors, elevator operators, street and highway employees, teachers, librarians, electricians, technicians, policemen, firemen, guards, repairmen, cooks, waiters, attendants, nurses, and doctors. It is the purpose of my proposal to have all these municipal employees treated as other employees in our social-security program.

Upon the passage by Congress of the proposal which I am offering today, any one of the 48 States, or all of them, can extend social security to its employees and to the employees of any or all of its political subdivisions. It authorizes the Federal Security Administrator to enter into compacts with the individual States for the purpose of extending the benefits of the old-age and survivors insurance to the employees of such States and subdivisions. Such compacts may provide for all or specified classes of:

First. Employees of the States only; or,

Second. Employees of one or more political subdivisions thereof only; or,

Third. Employees of the State, and employees of one or more political subdivisions thereof.

The compact shall provide:

First. That benefits shall be provided for the employees affected on the same basis as for other employees;

Second. That the State or political subdivision which is the employer, shall pay to the United States amounts equivalent to the excise tax imposed on employers and shall collect and pay the United States the tax imposed on the income of employees under the Social Security Act.

It is estimated that there are about 9,000,000 self-employed people in the United States. These men and women have no social security. Yet these individuals, by making their own jobs, lessen the threat of unemployment in the Nation. Many of these self-employed provide work for others. It is decidedly in the public interest for us to make self-employment as attractive as possible. The more people who are encouraged to go on their own and create jobs the more job opportunities will be available. From this group spring the enterprises that grow and expand and which provide employment for great numbers.

Under my proposal for the self-employed which will be introduced later, the benefits of social security will be extended to them on a voluntary basis. The individual may elect to come into the program. It does not force him to do so. A list of the self-employed would be of great length. It would include the owners of all unincorporated businesses, such as grocers, butchers, blacksmiths, editors, clothiers, cobblers, repairmen, garagemen, lawyers, doctors, bakers, produce buyers, insurance men, dentists, seamstresses, tailors, cleaners, barbers, beauticians, farmers, contractors, lumbermen, builders, auctioneers, filling-station operators, realtors, and countless others.

Many of the self-employed are now paying social-security taxes on their own employees. It will be a simple matter for them to compute their own tax. There are other self-employed persons who may not have the adequate records to determine the base for their tax. Perhaps the man who creates his own job, by going from door to door sharpening knives for housewives, may not have all of the records that would be desirable, but he does face the problems of old age.

A plan of ascertaining the tax base is proposed in my bill. The base would be $500 or the person's income from his trade or business as shown by his income-tax report, whichever is the greater. The maximum base of $3,000 already in the social-security law will, of course, apply to the self-employed group.

In other words, a self-employed person who makes less than $500 would be taxed on the basis of $500 to qualify under the act. If his income-tax return shows that he has made more than $500, the figure taken from his income-tax return would be the base for determining the social-security tax and the benefits that he would draw. Since the old-age benefits to be paid are based on the amount of wages received, the individual making less than $500 would receive greater old-age benefits by treating his earnings as $500.

A troublesome question to be considered in this legislation is, Should the self-employed be required to pay both the employer's tax and the employee's tax? Strong arguments can be made for both propositions. If the owner of an unincorporated grocery store has four employees, the grocery business pays the employer's tax and the employees' portion of the tax is deducted from their wages. Perhaps the boss' social security might be handled in the same way.

On the other hand, so far as the individual employee is concerned, the only amount actually taken from his pay check is the employee's tax. Should the operator of a small repair shop, for instance, pay only the employee's tax or should he pay both? I have struck upon a compromise in this proposed legislation. Perhaps when the legislation is advanced a better formula might be suggested, but I propose the following: On the first $500 the self-employed person should pay the employee's tax only, and on that part of his earnings over $500 he should pay both the employee's tax and the employer's tax.

Under this plan, if a man operating a small business makes $1,100 a year he would pay the employee's tax on $500 and both the employee's and employer's tax on the other $600. If a lady doing sewing makes only $500 she would pay the employee's tax only. If a lawyer's income was $3,000 he would pay the employee's tax only on the first $500 and both taxes on the other $2,500.

Mr. Speaker, at the time the Federal social-security program was adopted there were many strong arguments that could have been made against it. It does make government more costly. It does place more burdens on the individual during his productive years. It does add to the cost of goods. I wish to point out, however, that these added burdens and costs fall on the individual and on the groups not covered by social security just as heavily and perhaps more so than on others. Many of the people not covered now by social security are paying part of the load for the people covered. For instance, when a farmer buys a new machine a great many social-security taxes are included in the price that he pays because this coverage was extended to employees in many of the stages of processing, manufacturing, and distributing that machine. It is all added to the cost.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we cannot escape the conclusion that no social-security plan can be defended that benefits part of the people and excludes millions of others. Old-age and survivors insurance should be made available to our public employees not now covered and to that great army of self-employed who are so essential to our free economy.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN AND THADDEUS KOSCIUSKO

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, today the Nation pauses to honor the greatest of immortalized American leaders. Abraham Lincoln's numerous patriotic statements and speeches will pass on through generations to come as an everlasting lesson in liberty, self-government, and human freedom. This generation of Americans and its leaders have learned to love and respect the ideals and utterances of Abraham Lincoln. Each succeeding generation since those dark Civil War days has profited by the example, common sense, and earnestness of this great man.

Today the greatest tribute within our power to Lincoln would be to rededicate the ideals of liberty, justice, and the inherent right of every man, woman, and child to continue in the enjoyment of American liberty which our forefathers so thoughtfully bestowed upon us through our Constitution.

Throughout every city, village, hamlet, and countryside in America today elders and school children are publicly and privately thinking of the great heritage this man of humble origin gave to our country and to the world. People are asking what would Lincoln do if he were at the head of this great modern America and confronted with the trying problems now presented to the world after the greatest war in all history. I believe if Lincoln were leading us today he would apply the same principles involving the fundamental rights of humanity for individual justice, self-government, and religious freedom. By our present-day leaders emulating the teachings and examples of the great Lincoln, which were fundamental laws for the preservation of free government, our country will continue to enjoy prosperity, contentment, and the American way of life.

It is a remarkable coincidence that this day, February 12, is also the birthday of another great liberty-loving patriot who contributed outstanding service for liberty not only to his native Poland but to the young America of 1776. I refer to Thaddeus Kosciusko. When our country was in its infancy in fighting for freedom and independence, this great Polish patriot came to our shores and devoted his life to the cause which was so dear to the hearts of every American and to the hearts of his native comrades in Poland. Few examples in world history will equal the great sacrifice and service which Kosciusko and his Polish compatriots contributed to American freedom in those dark days.

I again raise my voice to the Congress and ask that our great Government today reciprocate in every possible way by aiding Poland in reestablishing its status as an independent nation. The world knows that the heart and mind of every Pole is today looking forward to the hour when their historic country can again enjoy the rights of self-government, freedom of religion and independent thought which has been the ultimate goal of every patriotic Pole since the day centuries ago when it was the pioneer advocate of liberty and self-government in Europe.

Our country today is the leading Nation of the world and let us not turn our back to the teachings and examples set by the two leaders, Lincoln and Kosciusko, whom we honor on this February 12, 1947.

THADDEUS KOSCIUSKO

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker our commemoration today of the two hundred and first anniversary of America's great Polish benefactor, Thaddeus Kosciusko, seems to be a fitting occasion for a review of American relations with Poland. When I say Poland, I refer specifically to the so-called Warsaw regime which is now in power by virtue of the farcical elections of January 19.

The Warsaw regime, ladies and gentlemen, has challenged the United States. It has, in fact, thrown down the gauntlet to us. By its contemptuous refusal to heed our repeated protests, it has made it imperative that we accept that challenge or else lose not only our self-respect but our moral standing among the nations of the world.

Let me briefly review the incredible story of our relations with the Warsaw regime during the past 2 years. As you well know, at Yalta the United States, with Soviet Russia and Great Britain, guaranteed the Polish people an opportunity to obtain a representative government through free and unfettered elections. The provisional government was authorized on that condition, but it soon became obvious that the Warsaw regime was doing everything it could to assure that it would remain in power. It purposely delayed the elections, while by terrorism, intimidation, and bloodshed it reduced the political opposition to impotence. You know the whole sordid story. It has been told in detail through the excellent reporting of American correspondents.

A year ago, on the two hundredth anniversary of Kosciusko's birthday, I called attention to the dangerous developments in Poland. I said then on the floor of the House:

> On this two hundredth birthday of Thaddeus Kosciusko, we Americans are enjoying the independence for which he so fiercely fought. One may question whether his own native land is enjoying the independence which he vainly fought to gain for it during his eventful life. True, Poland is now free and independent, but disquieting stories of political murders and Communist terrorism continue to leak out of that devastated land. Such is our American debt to Poland, the land of our benefactor's birth, that I strongly urge that we, as a nation, continue to exhibit the liveliest concern in the welfare of Poland. Under various international agreements we are committed to guarantee free and unfettered elections in the liberated lands. I strongly urge that our State Department follow up Secretary Byrnes' remonstrances on the terrorism existing in Poland, and throw the great weight of America behind the fight of all true Poles for a truly free Poland.

The terrorism to which I referred, and against which Secretary Byrnes remonstrated, continued, and our State Department failed at the very time when strong representations might have stopped it. The United States did not throw its great weight behind the fight of all true Poles for a truly free Poland.

On May 3, the one hundred and fifty-fifth anniversary of the signing of the 3d of May Constitution of Poland, I renewed my warnings. On that date I said:

> Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to developments which have already occurred and which seem to cast grave doubts upon the good faith of the regime which we propose to further strengthen by our loans and credits. I feel that I am serving the real interests of the Polish people by pointing an emphatic finger at these developments. * * *
> It is evident to me, and should be to all the Members of the House, that the developments taking place now in Poland should be watched most carefully. What will it avail to have so-called free and unfettered elections in the fall if no one opposed to Soviet domination remains to vote? The pattern is evident. It has been followed many times before. The opposition is removed by all the various means which the Soviets know so well how to use. Then elections are held and the vote is announced as nearly unanimous * * * If our Government is serious in its desire to see that free and unfettered elections are really held and proposes to use this loan as a means of insuring this objective, then there is one thing that must be done, and be done immediately. Our State Department should demand an investigation of the charges made by the Peasant Party and demand further that the Allied press enjoy full freedom at once to report to the world upon developments in Poland. This is the time—before the elections—which is all important. The whole character of those elections is being determined now. If the Warsaw regime is sincere in giving its assurances in return for the loan, then it should not object to the fullest investigation of the Polish situation from this date to the holding of the elections.

I regret to say that our Government did not act with vigor and determination to assure those free elections. It is true that it sent protests on August 19 and November 22, 1946, but those protests were impudently ignored by the Warsaw regime and that at the very time when the Polish Government was seeking a loan from this country.

Again on January 6, 1947, I called upon the State Department to take more positive action in defense of the Yalta and Potsdam agreements:

> There is still time—

I said—

> for our State Department to redeem itself Until now it has let the Polish situation slide along. As a matter of fact, the British have done far more in the way of remonstrance to vindicate the Yalta and Potsdam agreements than have we. It is time that we assumed our share of the burden which we willingly accepted.
> There is still time, I say again, for our Government to exert every force at its disposal to insure that the elections to be held on January 19 are actually free and unfettered. This will, I admit, necessitate immediate action, but such action is imperative if the small nations throughout the world are to have any confidence at all in the promises and pledges of the United States.

On the 7th of January we learned that the State Department had sent identical notes on January 5 to the Soviet Union and to the British Government. In those notes we find that the State Department showed clearly that it understood the seriousness of the situation and what was really involved in it. I quote:

> In the view of my Government, what is involved here is the sanctity of international agreements, a principle upon which depends the establishment and maintenance of peace and the reign of justice under law. * * * Therefore, my Government believes that for any of the parties to this agreement to refrain from the most energetic efforts to see to its proper execution would be to fail in a most solemn obligation.

But what energetic efforts did our Government make? Most lamentably weak and ineffective ones. On January 9 Ambassador Arthur Bliss Lane delivered a note to the Polish Foreign Office. Noting the fact that the notes of August 19 and November 22 had not yet been answered, he informed the Warsaw regime of our "continuous concern over its preelection activities." He said that our Government was "especially perturbed," and further that it was "a source of regret to my Government that its previous efforts" had not resulted in any change in the course pursued by the Polish Government. He repeated the high-sounding sentences of the other notes regarding the sanctity of international agreements and ended with this "most energetic effort."

My Government would be failing in its duty if it did not again point out that the continuation of the present policy of suppression, coercion, and intimidation as applied to political opposition in Poland constitutes a violation of the letter as well as the spirit of the Yalta and Potsdam agreements.

This, my dear friends, was the total of our energetic efforts to uphold the Yalta agreements. Thus we fulfilled our most solemn obligation.

Our Government, my dear friends, continues to be faced by that "most solemn obligation" which it referred to in its note to the Soviet Union and to Great Britain. In fact, that obligation has grown since January 19. We cannot evade it. We cannot, as we have done so often in the past, pass off the situation as an accomplished fact about which nothing further can be done. We have an obligation not only to the Polish people but to our own Nation and to the world.

I quite agree with Mr. Sumner Welles that—

The question now is whether the Government of the United States and the governments of the other western democracies will adopt a positive policy in the light of what has taken place in Poland or whether they will continue to limit themselves to pro forma expressions or depreciation. * * *

The need for the American Government to make a basic decision can no longer be evaded. The good faith of the United States is directly involved. For it is a matter of official record that, in addition to the pledges set forth in the Yalta Agreement, the United States during the war years repeatedly and officially assured the Polish people through their representatives that it would never recognize a government "unrepresentative of Poland." Can the United States hope to retain the confidence of the smaller countries and to exercise a constructive influence in world affairs if it disregards pledges of so solemn a character?

It has been rightly observed that the case of the Polish elections involves much more than appears at first sight. It involves the whole question of communistic expansion in Europe. The Polish elections were but the most recent in a series of Soviet moves. Within the past 14 months the provisional Communist-controlled governments of eastern Europe have effected elections in Yugoslavia, Albania, Bulgaria, and Rumania.

Mr. Welles has rightly declared that:

It is vitally important that the Government of the United States decide whether any peaceful and lasting European order can be created if some of the component peoples are deprived of their right to self-determination and to sovereign liberty and when such international committments as those incorporated in the Atlantic Charter and the Yalta agreement are cynically violated.

That is the more fundamental reason why our Government must continue to concern itself with this Polish problem and exert really energetic efforts to rectify the situation before it worsens. Mr. Welles has suggested that—

The United States can now make it clear that in its considered judgment what has occurred in Poland constitutes a violation of the third article of the Atlantic Charter to which every member of the United Nations is committed under the United Nations declaration, as well as a violation of article I of the United Nations Charter, and that this Government will consequently submit the issues thereby raised to the United Nations at the next meeting of its General Assembly.

Mr. Welles has acutely appraised the true importance of the Polish problem, but I do not feel that his proposed remedy goes far enough. Immediate and vigorous action is necessary. The Assembly of the United Nations will not meet until late in the fall. If no action is taken during the next 9 months, the Warsaw regime will have consolidated its position just as the Communist-dominated regime in Rumania has already done. I may say in passing that our Government must not repeat its conduct in regard to Rumania. Since the fantastic elections in that country we have not protested the new government nor the parliament whose members were illegally elected. The result has been tyrannical oppression, economic inflation, and growing integration with the Soviet sphere. We must take action now to insure the collapse of the Warsaw regime. As Dorothy Thompson, recently returned from Warsaw, has said:

It is a Russian-satellite administration based on naked force, holding the Polish people to a solution disregardful of history, tradition, experience, justice, and economics.

Just this Monday she wrote:

Poland is not going through a revolution but through a shameless conquest.

What positive and immediate action can our Government take? We must cut off at once all economic assistance to the Warsaw regime, whether in goods or money. I cannot understand why the Secretary of the Treasury ordered the release, effective January 7, 1947, of Polish assets in the United States, and why the Secretary of State also released the gold and the accounts of the Bank of Poland. Why were these not held until after the election? Poland is asking for $500,000,000 from the International Bank on the claim that it is absolutely essential for the country's recovery. The United States should vote against that loan and do everything possible to prevent the bank from granting it.

It may be objected that such a refusal would work a hardship on the Polish people, but this objection does not take into account the spirit of the Polish people. I do not think I misjudge the spirit of that gallant people, their courage and their self-sacrifice, when I say that they would prefer to continue in their present plight rather than see the oppressive regime now in power consolidated and perpetuated by outside aid.

It is further objected that our refusal to give economic aid to Poland would drive her into the arms of the Soviet Union. But the arms of the Soviet Union are empty. Russia needs all her resources for her own rehabilitation. She could not help Poland substantially without seriously handicapping her own 5-year plans. Of course, this is where our policy must be consistent and integrated. If we should flood Russia with our economic aid we would make it possible for her to assist the Warsaw regime, thus nullifying the effects of our economic sanctions against that government. It is only the most realistic common sense which dictates what we should do with regard to Russia in this situation. No one doubts that the Warsaw regime has been acting with Soviet approval and support. Our economic sanctions must be extended to Russia. Specifically, we should demand the settlement of the $11,000,000,000 lend-lease bill. It passes belief that to date Russia has ignored all our requests for a settlement. Furthermore, we should refuse to send Russia the $25,000,000 of American industrial equipment; and this not only because of the recent revelations that the State Department had actually connived with the Soviets so that they could escape the shipping costs which Congress had demanded. We should refuse any further shipments to Russia until our notes regarding lend-lease settlement are at least answered.

I say nothing about the 95 ships which Russia continues to hold despite our repeated requests for their return. Just a year ago, on February 12, the Maritime Commission asked the State Department to begin immediate steps for the recovery of the vessels and we are told that the Russians have never acknowledged the State Department's communication. We do not need to seek for reasons to halt all economic assistance to people who treat us in such cavalier fashion.

Besides such immediate economic measures, we need to take prompt political action. I cannot agree with Mr. Sumner Welles that we should present the case of the Warsaw regime to the Assembly of the United Nations; and this not only because the Assembly does not meet for almost a year. I submit that the Polish situation is serious enough to warrant immediate action by the Security Council and I strongly urge that our Government immediately call it to the attention of that body.

In his famous speech at the University of Buffalo, on October 5, 1946, Justice Jackson, newly returned from Nuremberg, declared:

The victory has not ended or given promise of ending the oppression and injustice which breed international discords. We conquered a country whose predominant faction was practicing terrorism in most barbaric forms and on a vast scale. But the defeat of one group of oppressors does not end oppression. In many of its aspects persecution of minorities is an internal matter between the government and its citizens. But its disruptive effect on the international order is so direct that tyranny on a sizable scale anywhere is a matter of international concern.

Despite the fact that Poland's first postwar parliament issued a manifesto on January 29 promising the Polish people freedom of speech freedom of press, and the right of public assembly, it is quite obvious that there continues in that unhappy land tyranny on a sizable scale. The eyewitness testimony of such a skilled observer as Dorothy Thompson is sufficient proof of that. Because of that fact, the Polish situation is a matter of international concern. As such it should be brought to the attention of the Security Council.

On January 28, the State Department formally accused the Polish Government of widespread coercion and intimidation. It stated further that the United States Government firmly intended to maintain its interest in the welfare of the Polish people and to retain fully liberty of action to determine its future attitude toward the Polish Government. On February 4, President Truman, using the same words as the State Department, told the new Polish Ambassador that the Government of the United States has not lost interest in the welfare of the Polish people.

I strongly believe that we can no longer show our interest in the welfare of the Polish people, by mere protests and statements. No longer is it enough to utter platitudes in stained-glass attitudes. We must take positive action—the economic and political action I have recommended. Only thus can we hope to regain our self-respect and our moral standing among the peoples of the world.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, at times each of us is prone to become discouraged. We feel we have tasks that lie before us that are very, very difficult to handle. It brings down to my mind that when we get downhearted and downcast we should think of Lincoln. When Abraham Lincoln was a young man, he ran for the Legislature of Illinois and was defeated. He next entered business and failed and was 17 years paying off the debt of a defaulting partner. He became engaged to a beautiful young woman. She died. He tried to get in the United States land office but failed. He was a candidate for Congress and was badly defeated. He ran for the Senate of the United States and was again defeated. When we think of our tough luck, think of Lincoln.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DORN, for February 13, on account of personal business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MICHENER.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Most loving and patient Father, as Thy sons and daughters, may we see ourselves endowed with dignity and power and eternal life. Grant that we may meet our obligations with honor, taking no counsel with our fears or questioning the might of Thy wisdom.

Thou, our infinite Creator, didst look upon all Thy works and call them good. O move upon the wills of the nations and call them to unity, impressing them that none can stand founded upon injustice and racial hate. O Christ, brood over this wrongdoing world and sound the trumpet call of good will and brotherhood, for Thou alone canst break the fetters which enchain men.

O great Physician, mercifully remember those who are lonely at their cheerless firesides, and those in pain, waiting for the healing hand. O give them the spirit of joy for the spirit of heaviness.

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow.
Praise Him, all creatures here below.
Praise Him above, ye heavenly host.
Praise Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, after other Members who have special orders have completed their remarks, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of the speech which I made before the Milwaukee Association of Commerce on February 10.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO FILE REPORT BY JOINT COMMITTEE ON LEGISLATIVE BUDGET

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Joint Committee on Legislative Budget may have until midnight Saturday night in which to file a report required by section 138 of the Legislative Reorganization Act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it the intention to present reports simultaneously to the two Houses of Congress?

Mr. TABER. I understand so, although there has been no particular talk about that. We probably could not take it up on the floor before Wednesday in any event. I do not know when it could be taken up in the Senate.

Mr. CANNON. But it will be submitted to the respective Houses simultaneously?

Mr. TABER. I would expect so.

Mr. CANNON. There is no prospect of considering a joint resolution to defer the date?

Mr. TABER. Not so far as I know; I have not heard of any such possibility.

Mr. CANNON. Is it the intention to submit this under a special rule from the Rules Committee?

Mr. TABER. I would expect so.

Mr. CANNON. It is not considered as privileged.

Mr. TABER. I do not know whether it is privileged or not. I have not been into that question at all and have not consulted the Parliamentarian on it. I would expect there would be a rule upon it certainly covering the debate and permitting it to come up.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has not considered the nature of the rule, whether it will be a closed rule?

Mr. TABER. No; I have not considered it at all.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are we to understand that the full committee on the budget, as it is called, has taken any action whatsoever on this proposition?

Mr. TABER. That is correct. It has been called to meet at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, and I hope they will take action at that meeting or at some other time to which they will adjourn so that a report may be filed by Saturday night.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Then the gentleman has considered the possibility that the committee may not act tomorrow.

Mr. TABER. Oh, yes; I have felt that the committee would want to discuss the matter somewhat and that they should be given a reasonable opportunity, insofar as it is possible.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Just one more question, if the gentleman will permit: Would it be the intention of the leadership of that committee to hold a session on Saturday in case no agreement can be reached on Friday?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I thank the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York that the Joint Committee on the Budget have until midnight Saturday night to file a report?

There was no objection.

PROGRAM FOR MONDAY AND TUESDAY

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute for the purpose of making a statement with reference to the program.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, we have before the Appropriations Committee a deficiency estimate carrying some items in connection with the Veterans' Administration and the Division of Disbursements of the Treasury Department and one or two other small items that must be provided for by the 22d of the month. We marked the bill up this morning and expect to report it on Monday. We are hoping that the leadership will permit us to take it up on the floor on Tuesday and dispose of it.

The bill also contains a large number of rescissions of appropriations. I just wanted to make this statement in reference to the bill. I have talked with the Acting Speaker, with the acting majority leader, and with the ranking minority member of the committee with reference to the matter.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. CANNON. It is the intention of the gentleman, then, to call this up; it is a privileged bill?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Made up largely of emergency items. It is the gentleman's intention to call it up on Tuesday?

Mr. TABER. Yes. I would like also on Monday, if it is possible, to call up and dispose of a couple of short Senate resolutions with reference to the Senate housekeeping and get rid of them so that we may have our schedule clear.

Mr. CANNON. The report on those two resolutions from the House Committee on Appropriations is unanimous, is it?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, of course, I think the House will be very much interested if the gentleman will discuss the program for next week.

Mr. ARENDS. I will be glad to do so. For the information of the House, here is the tentative program for next week:

On Monday we will consider House Joint Resolution 114 from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, extending the power of the Maritime Commission to operate ships until July 1.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is under the War Shipping Board?

Mr. ARENDS. That is correct.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think that is a very necessary piece of legislation.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I understand that has got to be done before February 28?

Mr. ARENDS. That is right. On Tuesday we will consider a contempt citation from the Committee on Un-American Activities. Then there is the matter which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations just mentioned to the House and which I failed to mention to the majority leader. That is the matter of consideration of an urgent deficiency bill.

On Wednesday we have the legislative budget proposal.

On Thursday we will have House Joint Resolution 121 from the Committee on Ways and Means, an abatement of taxes relative to the United Nations gift. Following that, consideration will be given to H. R. 4, which comes from the Committee on the Judiciary, unanimously reported, Report No. 29.

The balance of the week is undetermined thereafter. However, we hope to express to the leadership on the other side what may follow after that.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it understood, then, that the Eisler contempt matter will come up on Tuesday before the matter that the Appropriations Committee is going to bring up?

Mr. ARENDS. It was placed on the agenda first, and we hope to follow that practice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS DISPENSED WITH

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday business be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, or any subcommittee thereof, may have permission to sit during the session of the House this afternoon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

GOVERNMENT PURCHASE OF LANDS

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I notice in the Washington Post of today that the United States Department of Forestry is contemplating the purchase of five tracts of land in four States; namely, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina. Maybe it is a good thing to purchase this land in Pennsylvania, I do not know, but I do want to point out here and now that the Federal Government has been buying so much land in the various States during the past 5, 6, or 10 years that in some of the States the Federal Government owns and controls practically the whole State.

The Members of Congress and the American people should and must remember that the more land the Federal Government buys the greater are the expenses of the Government to maintain it. It is not only the original cost of this land but the amount of money that must be appropriated by the Congress every year to maintain the land under Government control, to say nothing of the loss of taxes to the various States by putting these large tracts of land under Government control.

In my opinion, the time has come when we should put a curb on the various governmental agencies going out and buying land and taking it from the control of the States, whether this land is located in Pennsylvania or any other State. We should move rapidly toward decentralization of the National Government. Let the States and the people of the various States conduct and attend to their own business instead of permitting the Federal Government to supervise and look after not only public lands but everything an individual does in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat, it is time that we put a stop to this sort of thing and do it now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. STEFAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a letter.

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an article from a magazine which may slightly exceed two pages of the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed notwithstanding that fact.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, notwithstanding the cost, the extension may be made.

There was no objection.

INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, a meeting of the Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization, an affiliate of the United Nations designed to take over from UNRRA the care of refugees and displaced persons in Europe, is now being held in Geneva.

The plight of these living dead, the walking casualties of World War II, cries out for help to the conscience of the world. Some 1,000,000 refugees and displaced persons are largely under the care of the United States and Great Britain. Four-fifths of them are Poles, White Russians, and Ukrainians, most of whom refuse to be repatriated because of their opposition to the regimes now governing their countries.

It is a popular misconception that most of these displaced persons are Jews but, in fact, only about 25 percent of the aggregate number in Austria, Italy, and Germany are Jews, while 75 percent are Christians. But this 25 percent, the martyred remnant of the Jews of Europe long only for the true opening of the Jewish national home in Palestine.

The United States is now spending an estimated eight to ten million dollars a month to maintain displaced persons in the American zone of occupation in Europe. Our prospective contribution to the International Refugee Organization is $71,030,000, or roughly about 8 months' operation. The best way to spend money is to try to find a solution.

The United States has sent an official of the State department as a delegate to Geneva and, subject to appropriation by Congress, has subscribed 45.75 percent of the operating budget of the new organization. Even Great Britain, despite her own desperate plight, has agreed to subscribe 14.75 percent, her share of this budget. Canada has joined, too, as have France and Norway, the Philippines, Liberia, and Denmark, and three of our sister American Republics, Honduras, the Dominican Republic, and Guatemala, thus bringing the organization into reality through agreements to subscribe for almost 75 percent of its budget.

Let us pray that with united effort through this International Refugee Organization and through a just solution in Palestine, a ray of light may be introduced in the blackness—which is life—for the displaced persons and refugees in Europe in 1947.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McDONOUGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial appearing in the Los Angeles Times.

FEDERAL AID FOR EDUCATION

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, the importance of education becomes more apparent with the passing years. Our qualified teachers are abandoning their teaching profession for more lucrative pursuits, fewer and fewer graduates are coming from the teachers' colleges, there is widespread discontent among those who have continued teaching despite inadequate pay, and there are overcrowded classrooms and other disheartening conditions. Unless present trends are arrested, teaching may become a vanishing profession.

Education is a matter of national concern. It cannot be disputed that we do not have enough teachers and that many of our schools do not have proper and sufficient equipment with which to properly educate those who will direct the next generation.

Education is not an activity that pertains merely to children and school teachers but has a direct bearing on all of us. Wage earners, housewives, farmers, and businessmen all share in the benefits that education affords and each individual should assume certain obligations toward it.

Last year education stood at the foot of the class when the American people spent $7,000,000,000 for liquor; four billion for race tracks, beauty parlors, and cosmetics; and only $2,500,000,000 for education. It is time to invest more in education.

Our educational program must be in the hands of an adequately trained and skilled leadership compensated in conformity with their work. A Federal-aid provision must be enacted for this purpose. It is evident that there is an increasingly popular demand for such a program.

Mr. Speaker, as one of the ranking members of the House Committee on Education and Labor, I am introducing a Federal-aid bill for education which will give the underpaid teachers of America an increase in salary. Every elementary and high-school teacher will receive an additional $200 for the school year 1947–48. The cost of this program would amount to approximately $185,000,000.

A RESOLUTION TO DEFINE COMMUNISM

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include a resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced House Resolution 99 for the purpose of defining communism. In my opinion, it is time that communism is defined so that there will be no question about its insidious influences and the effect it is having on the people of the United States.

I have introduced this resolution for the purpose of establishing a clear definition of communism that can be easily understood. Heretofore there has been no clear definition, and because of this, many people have sympathized with communism and have become influenced to believe in it. Communism, as a political policy, or as a way of life, is inimical to the people of the United States and incompatible with our form of government. It advocates deceit, conspiracy, confusion, subversion, revolution, and the subordination of man to the state. It is not a political policy alone, but is an international conspiracy and an anti-Christian ideology that would destroy the purposes of the American Government as set forth in the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

It is time the Congress recognizes the truth about communism, and sets forth a clear definition of it for the protection of the people of the United States.

The House Un-American Activities Committee has recently done this Nation a great service by exposing and revealing the activities of Gerhard Eisler, reported to be the top Communist in this country. This committee now under Republican leadership is doing an outstanding job. Communism must be revealed and exposed and stamped out wherever it is found.

The State legislatures of the various States should study and review their statutes and outlaw the Communist Party in their States. Communism is not a political party, and it should not be recognized as such by any State in the Union.

The people of the United States must be aroused to its dangers and the House of Representatives should clearly define it so that the people of the Nation will have no doubt as to its meaning.

Americanism and communism cannot mix. Christian democracy and communism are incompatible. Freedom and liberty as we know them cannot tolerate communism. We must be vigilant and alert to the wiles and insidious influences it is attempting to inflict upon us. In our schools, in the press, through the radio, and our motion pictures, its agents, and in many cases its unsuspecting adherents, are expounding the theories of communism.

It should be defined so that all will be aware of its dangers to our way of life in the United States.

I trust that the Members of the House will read this resolution, and urge its passage in the near future.

House Resolution 99 reads as follows:

Whereas communism as a political policy, or as a way of life, is inimical to the people of the United States; and

Whereas communism advocates deceit, conspiracy, confusion, subversion, revolution, and the subordination of man to the state; and, because of its practice of deceit and confusion, its real purposes and intentions are clouded and misunderstood to the extent that many persons in the United States have been influenced to believe in and sympathize with communism; and

Whereas there is a pressing need for a clear and easily understandable definition of communism in order to protect the people of the United States from its insidious influence: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That communism be defined and declared to be not a political policy, but is an international conspiracy and an anti-Christian ideology which advocates and practices deceit, confusion, subversion, revolution, and the subordination of man to the state, and which has for its purpose and intention the overthrow of any democratic form of government by force and violence, if necessary; and be it further

Resolved, That any person, either citizen or alien, adhering to or expounding the purposes and intentions of communism, should be exposed and revealed as an enemy of the United States and dealt with accordingly.

OFFICE OF TEMPORARY CONTROLS

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the wisdom of those who do our economic thinking and planning for us down at the old Civilian Production Administration, now the Office of Temporary Controls, certainly passeth all understanding.

Like every other Member of Congress, I have had many, many appeals through my office and directed to this agency for authority to construct buildings of one type or another. At the present time, or rather up until 2 days ago, there were five such cases still pending through my office.

One, an application for an addition for much-needed extra quarters for a bank, was filed last June and is now pending here on its third appeal.

Another, an application for an addition to a garage, was filed last September. Its fate is the same.

Two others are for churches—for places of worship for needy congregations. One, an addition to a church, has been pending since last September. Another congregation has no place of worship at all except the use of an undertaker's parlor on those Sundays when the undertaker does not require the parlor for the conduct of his own business. The people of this congregation had asked their Government only for authority to build a basement of what might later be their church building, but since the first day of last June the Government planners have continued to say, "No; you dare not do it."

Now comes the crowning blow of all. The fifth case was filed in December, less than 2 months ago. It was an application to build a roller-skating rink. Yes; you guessed it. The wise men of the Office of Temporary Controls 2 days ago gave approval for the construction of the roller-skating rink.

Meanwhile, the bank, the garage, and the two church congregations are still waiting for some action by their Government.

You do not have to be crazy to work for the New Deal, but it helps.

RE-REFERENCE OF BILLS

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services be discharged from further consideration of the bills, H. R. 243, H. R. 507, and H. R. 1184, and that they be referred to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein an editorial character sketch of Abraham Lincoln written in 1860. I do this because I think it is a proper follow-up to the magnificent addresses we listened to yesterday on the birthday of two great liberty-loving men.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

ATOMIC POWER

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that the committee of the other body that is considering to whom is to be entrusted the atomic secrets of America will make haste in its decision while there are still some secrets left. Yesterday, the Office of Technical Services of the United States Department of Commerce issued its monthly magazine, Federal Science Progress, in which is contained an article entitled "Uranium," which includes, among other things, several pictures of the mechanics of fission, a complete atomic power plant, and a formula, in technical and scientific language, for the creation of atomic power. It seems to me of the most vital importance that every Member of both Houses of Congress should send down to the Department of Commerce and get one of these magazines. Perhaps we will not need an atomic commission.

REDUCTION OF GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, as one who promised the people of my district during my recent campaign for reelection that I would vote to cut Government expenditures, I want to reiterate now my desire to see us economize in every possible way. There are many bureaus and agencies here in Washington that should be cut down and cut out, and I believe this Congress is going to do it.

However, I listen with some alarm to loud threats to use the ax on the vital spots of our armed forces. Oh, I grant that a lot of money may be going to waste in the Army and the Navy—I realize many millions already have, because war is a costly business and this last one topped them all.

But I want to raise a finger of warning that Congress must proceed with caution when we start reducing military and naval expenses. They should certainly be reduced and there is probably a lot of room in which to reduce them. But where and how? Before we decide that question, I want to hear from our Committee on Armed Services, from our military leaders, our generals and admirals, who ought to know what the score is.

Briefly, we must proceed cautiously and carefully in planning our national defenses. The country's guard must be kept up and this Congress is responsible for retaining it.

Personally I do not feel we are in immediate danger of attack from any source today. But clouds of trouble often gather in a few hours. We must be ready to meet any exigency.

Then, too, we would waste billions already expended if we did not look after and keep in order the vast stock of remaining weapons and equipment we already have. It took several years of titanic effort on the part of the American people to produce this equipment. Some of it we must dispose of, as we have already, but much of it we must save, use, and renovate from time to time. Such action will prevent great future outlays if the time ever comes when war visits us again, which God forbid.

So I say, let us examine our defenses carefully, let us see how sufficient they are, and just how far we dare go in reducing the Army and Navy budgets. I believe these budgets can be reduced, but I am going to scrutinize matters in this regard very closely before I decide on a final limit.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. STIGLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday next at the conclusion of special orders heretofore entered and the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk I may address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PRICE of Illinois asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the St. Louis Star-Times.

Mr. McCORMACK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

ARMY AND NAVY APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to hear the remarks of my distinguished friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL]. It is time that we stop, look, and listen, and realize just what faces our country and the rest of the world at this time and the importance of America maintaining its power—a power to be used for good—the power of America as represented by our economic system and, above all, by our Army, our Navy, and our Air Forces. I am very much concerned about what I read in the newspapers of what is proposed to be done in relation to sharply cutting the Army and Navy. The newspapers say $1,750,000,000 to around $2,000,000,000. We have read in the papers the reaction of Secretary Forrestal and Secretary Patterson and of the War and Navy Departments. Certainly we cannot ignore their statements as powerful pieces of evidence, and, furthermore, we ought to know ourselves just what is necessary for the national interest of our country to maintain the power of our Navy, our Army, and our Air Forces. After the last war we took the journey of false economy under the guise of back to normalcy. The next step then was pacifism, and the next step was isolationism. I hope we are not going to take that journey now. I am glad the gentleman from New York made the statement that he did. We will cooperate with you. The responsibility rests with his party.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. REDDEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. KEFAUVER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include some excerpts from an article from the Southern Progressive, and also to extend his remarks in the RECORD in another instance and include an address that he recently made.

Mr. ABERNETHY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a news item.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes today at the conclusion of special orders heretofore granted and the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

DR. GEORGE CARVER MEMORIAL STAMP

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege this morning to go to the White House after a few moments at the Post Office Department with a group of very eminent Americans interested in having a memorial stamp struck off for Dr. George Carver, who was born in Missouri and who worked for many years at Tuskegee Institute, of which I have the privilege of being a member of the board. Americans will be forever grateful that Dr. Carver had the urge and the vision to take the small and insignificant gifts of nature and give them greater stature and a recognition of their values as food for both animals and humans. Few men have contributed so much to the simple people while at the same time opening vast new vistas of science. All the world honors him as one of its eminent scientists.

Dr. Patterson, president of Tuskegee Institute, stated briefly the reason for our presence. The President replied most cordially, recalling his interest while in the Senate in collaborating with the gentleman from Missouri, DEWEY SHORT, in the establishing of a memorial park at Diamond Grove, Mo., Dr. Carver's birthplace, and paying sincere tribute to Dr. Carver, eminent American. Turning to the Postmaster General, he suggested that the idea of striking a memorial stamp would have his interested approval.

I am glad to report to the Congress the happy reception given the suggestion by the President and feel certain that Congress will anticipate prompt action from the Post Office Department.

COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries may have until midnight Saturday night in which to file a report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

REPEAL OR EMASCULATION OF THE WAGNER ACT IS NOT AN ANSWER TO PORTAL-TO-PORTAL PAY SUITS

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, it was in 1935 that Congress passed the great Wagner National Labor Relations Act which has done so much for the cause of labor and for the Nation, and has clearly demonstrated its benefits in the last decade.

Now I am informed that a serious and dangerous effort will be made to emasculate the Wagner Act by amendment, or to repeal outright this charter of labor's rights, and at all costs to eliminate those sections on which the portal-to-portal pay suits are based.

SORRY TO HEAR WAR-RICH CORPORATIONS AFFECTED BY ACT

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that this remarkable law may be utilized against those unfortunate companies and corporations which made millions during the war, and barely succeeded in accumulating profits, surplus, and reserves amounting to 26 billions of dollars; and I know it would cost them something if that law, which we passed and the Supreme Court upheld, were to remain in force.

CORPORATION PROFITS AT ALL-TIME HIGH

I know, too, Mr. Speaker, that according to the labor-baiters, corporations are suffering terrific losses at the hands of labor, and the corporations will be destroyed.

Mr. Speaker, the facts disprove these claims.

The official estimates for corporation earnings for the coming year of 1947 show that at the expected rate of national production these corporations for which so many tears are shed will have a clear profit after taxes are paid of more than 16 billion dollars, four times the average profit in the prewar period from 1936–39, inclusive.

Here, Mr. Speaker, are the figures as computed from Department of Commerce statistics:

All corporations

[In billions]

Year:	Profits after taxes
1936–39 (average)	$3.9
1942–45 (average)	9.5
1946 (estimate)	11.8
1947 (estimate)	16.1

FAR EXCEED PROFITS UNDER REPUBLICAN ADMINISTRATIONS

These figures, Mr. Speaker, do not indicate that any corporations are being destroyed by the Wagner Act. On the other hand, they indicate that since the enactment of the National Labor Relations Act, which has helped smooth the way to labor peace and increased output per man-hour, profits have climbed and climbed.

In those lush and happy years under Republican administrations for which businessmen are always pining, when the Government was run by and for business, no such manufacturing profits were ever accumulated. Prosperity is created by spending power, properly exercised. When workers are well paid and have a margin above bare existence, they create their own vast markets for the products—and the profits—of industry.

No, Mr. Speaker, business and industry are not being destroyed by labor, nor hurt by the demands of labor; but our prosperity can be wrecked if the demands of business and industry are given in to.

I fully appreciate the fact that the gentlemen who have received consent to address the House later on, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] will, in all likelihood and in their usual way, assail this great law and labor generally, with their distortions and misleading statements; and I shall be surprised if they are not joined in their attacks by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH], who never permit an opportunity to go by to point out what they call the great danger to the country from the "wealth" and "security" labor has accumulated as a result of the continuous reductions in the cost of living by these benevolent and humane and ever-profit-hungry corporations, cartels, and combinations, notwithstanding the fact that living costs continue to go up and up and real wages to go down and down.

REASONS FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL PAY EXPLAINED

Mr. Speaker, I have here a fair and comprehensive discussion and explanation of the operation of the law in regard to portal-to-portal pay, together with some typical provisions for portal-to-portal pay as embodied in union contracts, and I ask unanimous consent that I may insert this statement as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, since the court decisions upholding the principle of claims for portal-to-portal pay, a vast debate has broken out in both Houses of Congress, in the newspapers, and on the radio. The merits of the claims have become hopelessly obscured by the flood of propaganda from both sides.

Dismissal of the Mount Clemens Pottery Co. suit has not, to my mind, in any way impaired the validity of the principle under which that and other civil suits were brought. It is no answer merely to threaten to repeal those portions of the Wagner Act under which the action was initiated, for that does not eliminate a continuing source of bad relations with workers.

PAY CLAIMS COMPARABLE TO MANUFACTURERS' CLAIMS FOR REIMBURSEMENT

The portal-to-portal pay claims are not just for pay for walking in and out of the plant, as some have claimed. They are requests by the men that they be paid for the time they put in before the shift begins setting up their machines and getting ready to operate, and after the shift cleaning up and putting away tools, and other travel in the plant premises necessary to the job.

This is far more justifiable than the millions of dollars paid to war contractors operating under cost-plus contracts for time when they kept hundreds, or even thousands, of men waiting around doing nothing, for which they were fully reimbursed and usually made a profit. It is more justifiable than the payments made to war contractors who did research for peacetime operations, or even set up their machines, and fully reconverted their factories, and charged it all to the Government. The report of the Office of Contract Settlement, United States Treasury, which we have just received, tells some of the story on that.

If you read the financial pages of the newspapers, or the Washington News Letters, or even our Government reports, you will know that business is in pretty good shape. The few manufacturers operating at a loss in the present market are simply inefficient managers. The only exceptions I make are for those few who are genuinely unable to obtain materials because in mistaken zeal they demanded that all controls be removed from the things they needed and those who got there first with the most money cornered the materials.

The matter referred to follows:

STATEMENT BY RICHARD T. LEONARD, VICE PRESIDENT, INTERNATIONAL UNION, UNITED AUTOMOBILE, AIRCRAFT, AND AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENT WORKERS OF AMERICA (UAW-CIO), TO THE SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE IN OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT

I am vice president of the international union, UAW-CIO. Our union has assisted its members in the filing of a number of suits against employers for back pay due them under the Fair Labor Standards Act. On behalf of our members who have filed these suits, I desire to register our objection to the numerous proposals now before the Senate to deprive them of their claims even before the courts have had an opportunity to pass upon them.

First, let me clarify the nature of our claims. The impression has been created that the so-called portal-to-portal claims consist only of walking time. Such an impression is completely untrue. A large proportion of the claims represents time necessarily consumed in preparing for work, such as changing into uniforms or special equipment, obtaining tools at the company's tool cribs, and setting up machines. Included in these claims is also time spent in returning tools to the tool crib, changing into street clothes, and cleaning up.

The time so spent is work actually required by the job and not merely to suit the convenience of the employee. Numerous decisions of the courts and rulings of the Wage and Hour Administrator over the years have held that time spent in these activities constitutes working time. There is no reason why an employer should not pay a worker for time so spent.

These claims also include time spent traveling to and from the job on the company premises. Contrary to the impression now sought to be created by employers, the workers have a reasonable and legal basis for claiming that travel time spent on the employers' premises in order to get to and from the job constitutes time worked for which they should be paid. A worker has only his time to sell. Once he enters the employer's premises, his time is no longer his own. It belongs to the employer. He is subject to plant rules and regulations from the time he enters the plant gate until he leaves the factory grounds. He may be discharged or disciplined for acts which his employer holds to be in violation of such rules and regulations, even though he is not actually at work on his job when such acts occur.

The second point I would like to make to this committee is that employers have long known that workers have claimed that travel time spent on the company's premises, and preparation, and clean-up time, are working time and should be paid for as such. As early as 1939 employers were advised by the Wage and Hour Division of the United States Department of Labor, that time spent in preparation for work constituted time worked. In 1944, employers were advised by the United States Supreme Court in the Tennessee Coal and Iron case that travel time would be considered as working time.

Furthermore, in collective bargaining our unions have always taken the position that travel time, preparatory and clean-up time and other similar work should be compensated by the employer. Many employers have agreed to pay for these activities and have included provisions in the contract which provides for their payment. I attach a typical list of such contract clauses.

The employers' claim of surprise is hypocritical and without any basis in fact. It is made only in an effort to influence the courts and Congress against the legitimate right of the workers to have their claims determined fairly by the courts.

Finally I would like to answer some of the hysterical attacks that have been made against workers for daring to file their claims in court. They have been called hijackers and racketeers and many other names. Workers are accustomed to such epithets when they go out on strike. During such strikes, they are usually condemned for having used their economic power instead of going into the courts. They are usually told that justice can be found in the courts rather than on the picket line. Now when they go into court they are called racketeers and hijackers. It doesn't seem to make much difference what the workers do to increase their earnings and better their conditions. If they make any concerted effort in that direction, whether they go into the courts or on the picket lines, they will be condemned. With the workers, it appears to be a case of "damned if you do and damned if you don't."

Only recently the miners went out on strike in an effort to obtain higher wages. When the court issued an injunction prohibiting the strike, the miners were violently condemned for not going back to work and allowing the court to determine the legal questions involved. Today the same employers and the same newspapers who condemned the miners for not going into the courts to have their legal rights determined are condemning the workers for taking their claims for back pay into court.

Apparently industry is unwilling to have the courts decide an issue unless they are reasonably certain the courts will decide in their favor. If the chances are not weighted in advance in their favor, they come to Congress. This jockeying by industry between Congress and the courts to win a decision against the workers only convinces the workers that they cannot obtain impartial justice. This aspect of the problem is more fundamentally important to our Nation than whether employers will be required to pay the claims of the workers. It undermines the confidence of American workers in the institutions of our Government.

Only last year industry came to Congress and obtained passage of a law which would give industry oil rights in the marginal land of the State of California at a time when the Government was attempting, successfully, to establish the right of the people in this oil by a suit in the courts, and it was by virtue of the veto of the President that the issue remains one which will be determined by the courts on the basis of the law rather than through the pressure of those who seek to use Congress to further their private interests.

Industry bewails the fact that these claims total billions of dollars, which, if collected, will bankrupt it. The amount the workers will finally be awarded by the courts, if they are successful, will undoubtedly be less than is now claimed However, it should be noted that industry has not felt hesitant about asking for and actually obtaining several billion dollars in tax refunds from the Treasury, as disclosed in the President's tax message to Congress.

If industry obtains billions in back tax refunds under the income-tax law from the Treasury, it is viewed as its just right under the law. But when the workers of industry merely file suit to recover back pay under the Fair Labor Standards Act, they are violently attacked as racketeers and hijackers and Congress is asked to leap and rescue industry from the courts.

Why should employers who have sought to avoid full compliance with the law over the past 7 years be relieved of the consequences of their own violations—at the expense of those whom they have deprived of their full compensation? Whether a wage-hour claim is so stale that it should be barred should be determined, as in the case of all other claims, by the applicable statute of limitations as construed by the courts.

If the Supreme Court were to rule that a corporate-tax assessment levied by Congress and paid by the corporations 6 years ago was an unconstitutional exercise of legislative power, would there be any reluctance on the part of the affected corporations to file suit for repayment—in full? And would the press go into convulsions when they did so?

Are the rights of employees to be treated as inferior to the rights of their employers?

THE POSTMASTER'S POLITICAL SPEECH TO FEDERAL WORKERS WAS UNTIMELY

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker it seems to me Mr. Hannegan, Postmaster General, followed poor judgment in using his invitation as an honored guest at a dinner given in his honor by a group of Federal workers to announce his candidate for President.

According to press reports, Mr. Hannegan was invited to speak at a dinner meeting at the big Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, where 2,000 postal supervisors and other Government employees were in attendance. Mr. Hannegan is Postmaster General and a member of the President's Cabinet. He is also the national chairman, the highest official, in his political party.

I know full well Mr. Hannegan has a right to announce his candidate for President where he pleases. I do think, however, it shows rather poor taste for him to go there as Postmaster General and then step out of that role and, as chairman of a political party, use Government employees under his Department as a sounding board to announce his candidate for the highest political office in the land. It is unusual that on an occasion of this kind the Postmaster General would devote most of his speech dealing with political matters.

Again, I do not want to be misunderstood. Mr. Hannegan probably had a right to do the thing to which I have called your attention, but I think he used extremely bad taste in taking advantage of his political position to use 2,000 Government workers, at a banquet given in his honor, as a political sounding board.

DR. CARVER

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, I was very much delighted to hear the words of the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON] when she told us there would be a memorial stamp issued in the memory of a great American, one who, though born in Missouri as the gentlewoman stated, did at least the greater part of his fine work for humanity in my State of Alabama. Dr. Carver is regarded by the people of Alabama not only as one of the great citizens of our State, but as one of the great citizens, one of the great scientists, one of the great leaders of all time, of the United States. Hence, it affords me unusual pleasure to join the gentlewoman from Ohio in the very appropriate gratification she expressed that this highly appropriate honor will be paid to this great American.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JARMAN] has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GARY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement by Mr. Herbert H. Meyers before the Fertilizer Subcommittee of the House Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include an editorial from the Chicago Tribune and a statement of my own.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

REPUBLICAN PROMISES

Mr. HOFFMAN. "Stop, look, and listen," said the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL]; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] repeated the warning. The argument seems to be that no matter what the request of the Army, the Navy, the One-Worlders, or those who want the American taxpayer to feed, clothe, house, and keep in idleness inhabitants of all the rest of the world, if this Congress attempts to practice economy along any line, it will necessarily deprive the country of adequate defense. That is all nonsense. Everyone wants not only an adequate national defense, but plenty over and above what will give us an adequate defense.

For myself I would make our military might equal to that of any possible combination of armed force which can be brought against us but that is no reason why billions of dollars should be wasted by those in charge of our national defense and I, for one, propose to do my part to prevent needless, wasteful spending, no matter what executive agency attempts to follow that course. Now, it is just too bad that those two gentlemen did not think of that slogan about 10 years ago.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I was not here.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I will say to the gentleman from New York that if he was not here then he has certainly by strenuous service made up for it since he came here. If my recollection serves me correctly, the gentleman from New York has always been a great champion of everyone who wanted something or who might appreciate something. I recall his latest thought, just a couple of days ago, when he wanted every American housewife given a bonus of 5 pounds of sugar. I am with him on that if some way to do it can be devised.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Twenty-five pounds.

Mr. HOFFMAN. How much?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Twenty-five pounds.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I am with you on that. I will make it 50. Why not? It is all right to advocate this, that, or the other thing if we do not raise false hopes—it is all very fine, but unfortunately it just cannot be done. Mind you, we would all do all these generous things if we could, but we know those things cannot be done—so why try to fool the home folks? It certainly does step up postal receipts for it makes a lot of people write in to us backing up those wonderful ideas that come to the active and fertile mind of our young and enthusiastic friend. Sure, his wonderful ideas have increased the postal receipts because a lot of folk write us asking us to get behind the many alluring ideas he suggests. No one can accuse him of not presenting pleasing plans. Yes; I am back of the gentleman from New York, but we all know that many of the gifts he advocates cannot be made. The gentleman advocated bringing back the soldiers from Europe when they were overseas. He advocated sending the boys home on furlough at Government expense at Christmastime. We knew it could not be done, but it was a pleasant thought. I would like to have done it, Eddie, I sure would, but you just cannot bring those things about. Unfortunately the plans he proposed raised false hopes in the minds of many of the parents. And I will say that I was kept busy answering requests that we get behind our good friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL]. The gentleman from Massachusetts said: "Stop, look, and listen!" Sure, his party has been spending money for the last 10 years until the national debt has been rolled up to where the interest charge alone amounts to $3 per month on every American in the United States. Why did you not think about that when you were advocating that Harry Hopkins' program and all those other wasteful spending programs? It is too late, you know, too late, to remedy that and now along comes the Chicago Tribune, a great newspaper, a newspaper that is probably responsible more than any publication in the United States for the election of Republicans from the Midwest. Another paper down there, the South Bend Tribune, published by our good friend, Mr. Miller, preached along the same line. It did not have quite as large a circulation but it did just as fine work in its territory. Another paper that did as good work as some of the dailies is one published in the little town of Cassopolis every week by William Berkey, week after week preaching the principle of Americanism, preaching the true doctrine of Americanism.

Now comes the Chicago Tribune, and what does it say? I asked the former Speaker of the House, the present minority leader, if he would object if I quoted from this Tribune editorial which I will insert in the RECORD. I will read only a part of it now. It is captioned "Republican promises."

It reads in part:

Sooner or later—

And by the way, I may say that the former Speaker consented that I might read this. He said he had read it. I only wonder that he or some other Democrat did not call it to our attention. I thought I had better do it for certainly we will be reminded of its contents. I read:

Sooner or later the Republican Congress will get around to passing some kind of a tax bill providing some kind of a tax cut. Sooner or later the Republicans will balance the budget with something over for debt reduction. Sooner or later they will revise the labor laws to prevent the abuses that have grown in the shadow of the Norris-LaGuardia and the Wagner Acts and other labor legislation.

All of this we can believe; and we can even hope that the majority one of these days will make its will known in the field of foreign relations.

I will skip a little. Again I read:

What we cannot understand, however, is the miserable failure.

I should have skipped those words.

What we can't understand, however, is the miserable failure of the Republicans to honor their promises on any of these subjects with promptness and decision.

Note that, "promptness and decision."

I drop down to another paragraph:

We have heard the excuses and we don't think much of them. This Congress, it is said, is moving more rapidly than most of its predecessors. No one who remembers how speedily Congress could push through appropriations for war will believe this tale; and even if it were true, what of it?

I will not read the rest of it. I will print it at the end of these observations together with a statement I made on the 8th of the month, just 3 days preceding this editorial.

Mr. RANKIN. Read the rest of it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], who has secured so much cheap light for constituents through the TVA down in his area, electricity being as cheap as it is, may read it in the RECORD of tomorrow.

Mr. RANKIN. In the TVA area we have——

Mr. HOFFMAN. We have more farms in Michigan which have electricity from private ownership, twice over, than you have in Mississippi from the TVA.

Mr. RANKIN. You get it from the REA.

Mr. GIFFORD. May I add a word? She said to him, "Did you not promise me you would have eyes and look at no other woman but me?" He said, "Did you not recognize that as a campaign promise?"

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is the sentiment expressed by a great Republican one time when he was referring to certain utterances of a former President, a President who ran on the so-called Democratic ticket, although it was not that at all.

Mr. EBERHARTER. And four times.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Now, what is the purpose of this? Last week I put out a statement which I will insert in the RECORD, entitled "You Are in a Hurry, So Are We. Do Not Be Impatient." I am saying that now to the editors of the Chicago Tribune. I am afraid some people do not realize the sort of a task we have, nor do they realize how habit slows us down. Nor have they the slightest idea of how the people accustomed to getting something for nothing from the New Deal now insist upon more and greater appropriations, while at the same time demanding that we cut the tax bill. The last Congress gave us a reorganization bill. We have been trying to get familiar with the working tools that we have. This, I wrote on the 8th:

Some radio commentators, columnists, certain editors, and New Deal spokesmen who thought the New Deal should last forever, who were not only bitterly disappointed when the returns of the November last election were in but seemed to be thoroughly convinced that the American people neither knew what they were doing nor what was good for them when they registered their protest against wasteful spending, inefficiency, and regimentation are now shouting that the Republican Congress is a do-nothing Congress.

May I say that we might better be a do-nothing Congress than go ahead and wreck the country as did the New Dealers during the past 10 or 12 years. They did not keep us out of war; they raised heck—get that word "heck," not the other word—with our whole domestic economy; put people under regimentation and bureaucratic control; and gave us, I will admit, a New Deal Supreme Court, which the other day rendered 12 opinions—was it—in 3 cases, or was it just 9? Read them. It will do your heart good, or will it?

Here is the point in the whole thing:

If this Congress, in 6 months, gives the country worth-while labor legislation, ends the abuses which have been, and are being, practiced by some Government agencies, it will have done a real worth-while job.

May I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], who is talking about the Wagner Act, that he go over to the hearings now being held in the caucus room by the House Committee on Labor and learn something. The gentleman is clear out of date, way back beyond the "horse and buggy" days. Back with Noah and the Ark. Go over there and hear how the Wagner Act has been and is being used to protect racketeers, how men go out under the shadow of the protection of the Labor Board and shake down the employers; oh, yes; the employees, too, day after day, week after week. That is what is being done. That has been the practice for the past 10 years.

If there is any one thing in this country that needs to be repealed, it is that Wagner Act; the National Labor Relations Act and this committee, unless I mistake its temper, will give us worthwhile, just, equitable labor legislation which, for the first time, will protect not only the union but the individual worker, the man who does the work. It will protect the employer and—something you never on your side thought of during the last 10 years—it will protect the great American public from the racketeering that was built up while the New Deal was in power.

Now, our chairman said last night, I understand from the press, that they were going to wait until the other body got through considering labor legislation and brought out a bill. I want to go along. I am supposed to be, and I am trying, oh, so hard, to be a regular Republican—to go along with the leadership. I am trying hard, and I hope, if I ever slip, as I may, that the boys will forgive me and let me try once more. But, if I had my way, the House Committee on Labor would bring out within a week a labor bill and submit it to the judgment of the House. Everyone who is a Member of this House knows that it took 2 years, two long years, after we passed the Hobbs antiracketeering bill, for the other body to get it out of the dust under which it was buried over there and put it on the books.

This House has a responsibility laid upon it by the people in the November election. We cannot shirk that responsibility by waiting for the other body to act.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief observation?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COX. The criticism that is implied from the remarks of the gentleman is becoming widespread. I think the country is beginning to feel that there is too much temporizing. It is my view that the gentleman is correct; that this House ought not to wait but go forward in the doing of those things which the country needs so badly.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Seldom does a day pass that I do not get from the home folks two or three letters raking me over the coals because our Committee on Labor has not written a bill. Let me read from a letter received from an old friend in the town where I was raised. This letter came in on the 3d and a copy went to Senator TAFT:

The publicity coming from Washington makes me feel a little bit ill. I had looked forward with pleasure to seeing the old gang of New Dealers kicked out of there, but if all the Republicans have to offer is a 10-percent reduction from the thirty-seven billion budget that "Light Horse Harry" proposed, then it shall be my future policy to definitely stay away from the polls.

There is still one thing worse than a financially bankrupt nation, and that one thing is a morally bankrupt nation. Even though a man is a politician there are times when his promises should be kept.

The other day I had a conversation with Art Beesley on the street and Art excused you fellows in Washington, saying there had been commitments made that would prohibit a sizable reduction for the budget beginning next July 1. If the Republicans do not reduce this budget to a reasonable figure, I definitely am not going to vote, because I will have decided there isn't much difference.

We have heard you and the rest of your party members condemn Franklin D. Roosevelt for the lies he told and got away with, and now it seems to me you are following in his footsteps. Probably Mr. Truman cooperated by raising his budget 10 percent over what he had expected to get, and then you fellows come along and shadow box and reduce it 10 percent—so we are no better off than we would have been had control rested with the spendthrifts who were in power last year.

Probably the rank and file of the people do not have enough faith in public opinion to even write to their Representative to bring this matter up, but I am still gullible enough to believe there may still be some hope. You will note I am sending a carbon copy of this letter to Senator ———. Perhaps he will realize that there may be two or three people in every small town (such as myself) who will control a dozen or more votes in 1948, and who may decide it would be just as well to leave Mr. Truman in as it would to put Mr. ——— or some of his would-be nominees up for President.

I don't like to write this kind of letter, but I have been giving it a good deal of thought each week when I pay my helper in the office, and as March 15 draws near, when I will again be called on to write a sizable check to help pay for the money wasted by our bureaucrats (both Republican and Democrat) in Washington.

These remarks are not leveled at you, but, as far as I am concerned, the Republicans are going to catch it in the future just the same as the New Dealers did last fall, and I know a few other people in this community who feel the same way.

That letter was written by a lifelong Republican—it is hard to take.

I realize that the writing of a tax bill is a tremendous task, and as to that legislation I am satisfied to leave it with the Committee on Ways and Means, as nonpartisan a committee as the House could possibly create.

As for the labor legislation, I think it is time that the Labor Committee, if some folks will only let it or encourage it to act, can write a bill which will be just to all parties. We intend to do just that. We intend to take time enough to write a worth-while bill, but it is my hope we will not wait for the Senate—we all know what will happen if we wait for the Labor Committee of that body.

For 12 long years this labor has been building up. It can't be taken apart all at once, or in a few moments. When you wreck a skyscraper you do not blow it up by dynamite, you take it apart piece by piece, beginning at the top, then erect a new—a better structure. That is just what we are doing with the left wing, communistic, New Deal machine.

The New Dealers are in control down there in the departments at the other end of the Avenue, as you gentlemen all know. So I would like to say to the editors of the Chicago Tribune, I sympathize with you, I share your impatience, because from my own folks at home I get the same thought that is expressed in that editorial. But neither the editors nor the folks at home realize the magnitude, the tightness, the power of this machine that exists here in the executive departments in Washington. So I do hope that they will not be impatient with us; that they will give us an opportunity before they bear down too hard. I know, for myself, that this 8-hour day, 40-hour week has no application and I know that many Members on the majority side you will find over here in their offices long before this 9-o'clock dead line in the morning and long after 5 o'clock in the evening.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I have as much interest in getting proper legislation, I think, as any Member of the House. I do not agree with the criticism of the present Labor Committee for holding hearings. I think if every Member of this House would go and sit in those labor hearings and hear the things I have heard in the last 3 days they would more thoroughly realize the absolute necessity for some restraint on present conditions. For instance, yesterday I believe you had up the question of the racketeering in the beer industry in the city of Pittsburgh, a terrific thing, practically a state of revolution that exists there, and yet no Members of the House know about that except those who choose to attend these committee hearings.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan be permitted to proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. If the Members of this House and the public could know what is going on in the way of hearings before that committee, they would be better educated to do the job that so vitally needs doing.

You had up the day before, I recall, the question of the fruit and produce dealers in the city of Philadelphia, where the whole business of distributing necessary food to the people of that city, a city of a million and a half people, has been absolutely paralyzed for a period of 6 weeks because of a boycott arrangement. If you gentlemen could hear those things and know them, you would realize that the Committee on Labor is working hard and conscientiously and trying to bring before this body a bill based upon those hearings and so drafted as to give the relief that is so vitally needed.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Let there be no misunderstanding as to my position. I agree wholeheartedly with what the gentleman from Virginia has just said. My only thought is that some of these hearings do not give us any new information on the methods and procedure that have been followed for 10 years. For example, this hearing about the Philadelphia Record, that was all very fine, but what it amounted to was that Mr. Stern had taken a group to his heart, and they just chewed and clawed him all up when they got around to it. That is all that hearing demonstrated.

I can cite here the case of Norman Zalezzi down in Indianapolis, where the NLRB, through Dorothy L. Craig, one of their examiners, or agents, went around and asked those who advertised in the paper how much they were paying for advertising, and so sought to drive that paper out of business—a damnable case—and all because the editor ventured to express an opinion in an editorial that the CIO did not like.

I can cite you this hearing over there in the caucus room where we heard about a man who was running a dairy, with 10 employees, mostly his own folks, had a couple of hundred pickets thrown around his place, and they beat up one of the members of the family, or an employee. The places where these things happen are new. The people oppressed and beaten are not the ones who suffered before, but the procedure and the methods are the same—they follow the Communist lines. Those things are all bad. The point is that most of the facts are but a repetition of what has happened in years gone by and continuously been indulged in right down to the present moment. The gentleman from Virginia himself held hearings back in 1940. There are five or six books setting forth what he found, and the situation he brought to light was rotten; and the House twice, by a 2-to-1 vote, passed worth-while legislation. Where was it buried? In the other body—the body whose pleasure we are now asked to wait. I want none of that program. If you will read the testimony taken and the reports filed by the gentleman's committee, you will find the most damnable things detailed there, so unjust one hardly believes them—a record that is a disgrace to any nation which claims to guarantee freedom to its people. That is why I am anxious to get at the real trouble, for example, with these produce men up there in Philadelphia. The union, it is said, stopped the work of distributing produce to the people of Philadelphia.

Tomorrow morning, may I say to the gentleman, we are going to start in another committee, the Committee on Expenditures, and we are going to have in the Department of Justice expert on racketeering. We are going to give him a copy of the testimony taken by the Committee on Labor, not call the same witnesses but give him a copy, and we are going to ask him how come that the provisions of the Hobbs Antiracketeering Act are not enforced, if they have been violated, and if there is now no law to prevent a similar situation being brought about. Then we will offer a bill to give us one. Then we are going to ask him, "If that is a violation, are you going to do anything about it?" Then we are going to ask him, "When are you going to do it?" If he does not do anything, we are going to have him back the next week or the week after and ask him again, until we find out whether there is in these United States of ours any law to protect men who want to work, farmers who ship produce into Philadelphia and other cities. That is what we are after. That is why, when I know that for 10 long years there have been beatings and sluggings and destruction of property, I get a little impatient—a little, just a little impatient—when I learn that a man has been beaten, when I learn that a man has been driven out of business, where the activities are all in violation, plain violation, of the law of the land.

As the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] so well said, we must proceed with deliberation. Perhaps I am mistaken and it is necessary to once more drag across the stage the bloody dead body of American freedom; perhaps we must once more plant in lurid colors a picture of communistic activities being carried on in the industrial world—all designed to create civil strife. Perhaps, in order to arouse this or the other body to the necessity of labor legislation which will protect the right of the American citizen to work, the right of employer to carry on his business, the safety, health, and welfare of the public, we must have this parade of witnesses, this detailing of lawlessness, of violence. If that be necessary, so be it and let the hearings go on.

The overwhelming majority has heard the story so often, know the pattern that is being followed, that majority must realize that a law protecting the right to work, prohibit jurisdictional and secondary strikes, boycotts, outlawing violence, must be enacted by this Congress if it is to fulfill the expectations of the voters who sent it here.

The home folks know the situation. In my judgment, they know what they want. I hope we can give it to them without undue delay. Again, I repeat, I cannot see how anything is to be gained by waiting for the other body. It may, or it may not, put forth what the people want. Our responsibility is direct—we cannot shift it.

Perhaps I am too impatient. I often am. If I am, I know others who are altogether too slow, and if we can hit on a happy medium we might all be happier.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Dave Stern, the former owner of the Philadelphia Record, is not only reaping what he sowed but, according to the statement of the gentleman from Virginia, the people of Philadelphia are reaping what Dave Stern sowed.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; and so are the farmers all through the country because from California and Florida and Maine, and other States, this produce goes into the market, and when it gets down there this union ties it up and it cannot be sold, but is left to rot, or is sent to other markets. The editorial from the Chicago Tribune and a possible answer written 8 days before the editorial are as follows:

[From the Chicago Daily Tribune of February 11, 1947]

REPUBLICAN PROMISES

Sooner or later the Republican Congress will get around to passing some kind of a tax bill providing some kind of a tax cut. Sooner or later the Republicans will balance the budget with something over for debt reduction. Sooner or later they will revise the labor laws to prevent the abuses that have grown in the shadow of the Norris-LaGuardia and Wagner Acts and other labor legislation.

All this we can believe; and we can even hope that the majority one of these days will make its will known in the field of foreign relations despite all the nonsense being uttered by influential Members of the House and Senate in the name of a bipartisan foreign policy.

What we can't understand, however, is the miserable failure of the Republicans to honor their promises on any of these subjects with promptness and decision. Nobody can get himself elected to the House or the Senate who hasn't a reasonably well-developed sensitivity to the movement of public opinion. Surely the Congressmen, and we should think especially the new ones, know how grievously the people are disappointed with the record to date. The voters resent, and have a right to resent, the passage of a month and more with nothing accomplished, with every opportunity muffed, with every hope that brought about the great victory in November left unfulfilled.

We have heard the excuses and we don't think much of them. This Congress, it is said, is moving more rapidly than most of its predecessors. No one who remembers how speedily Congress could push through appropriations for war will believe this tale; and even if it were true, what of it? The Republicans have failed to fulfill their promise, particularly in the matter of the tax cut. If they had shaken the lead from their pants, had overcome the normal inertia at the beginning of a new session, and the special difficulties that the congressional reorganization bill is said to have created, the country would know that Republicans honor their word promptly and move with resolution. That would have done more to assure a victory in the national election in 1948 than anything else that is likely to happen in the meanwhile, for first impressions are strong. What the Republicans may eventually get around to do will not be nearly as important in forming a favorable public opinion.

All too many of the men who should be congressional leaders can't bring themselves to realize that they are no longer members of a minority. That was their status for so many years that they have lost what it takes to assume the initiative. More than that, the New Deal is still immensely powerful in the social life of Washington. The embassy crowd must play up to the New Dealers. All the heads of departments and bureaus are New Dealers. Washington is a city of jobholders intent on holding their jobs. The climate of opinion in the Capital is making Congress sluggish and ineffective.

Precious time has been lost. Factionalism within the Republican Party has been encouraged at a time when prompt action could have established a habit of cooperation and the quick compromise of minor disagreements. The public is disappointed and its feeling will soon be converted into active resentment unless the Republican leadership shakes itself free of its indecision.

YOU ARE IN A HURRY—SO ARE WE

DON'T BE IMPATIENT

Some radio commentators, columnists, some editors and New Deal spokesmen who thought the New Deal should last forever, who not only were bitterly disappointed when the returns of the November election were in, but seemed to be thoroughly convinced that the American people neither knew what they were doing or what was good for them when they registered their protest against wasteful spending, inefficiency, and regimentation, are now shouting that the Republican Congress is a do-nothing Congress. The wish is the father of the statements they make.

If they voiced their thoughts and their desires, we would learn they would be supremely happy if the Eightieth Congress did nothing. Deep down in their hearts they hoped that when the new Members of Congress came to Washington, their home folks would be forgotten. They hoped that social functions and the momentum of the New Deal would continue in force the policies of the last 12 years. Their thought—let the band play on—to heck with the cost.

President Truman was a great disappointment to them. Shrewd politician that he is, he recognized the election for what it was—a demand for a change. Looking for a smoke screen—a red herring—without delay he sanctioned the less effective, less drastic plans of the Republican leaders. He went as far as he could without really hurting his political machine.

DON'T WORRY

The mandate of the people will be carried out by the Eightieth Congress. There will be a reduction in the tax burden. There will be a reduction in Federal bureaus, agencies, and employees in those departments of the Federal Government where economy can be practiced without impairing essential public service. Whether a reduction in expenses or a lessening of the tax burden should come first is an open question. In my humble judgment, we should have both and without any more than the delay necessary to chart the proper course.

The House yesterday, when by more than a two-thirds vote, decided to submit to the people the question of whether Presidential terms should be limited to two, took an effective first step to block a trend which might give us a dictator.

Several committees of the Congress are carrying on quiet, painstaking investigations which in the end will give us worth-while results in the way of exposing reprehensible practices, curtailing needless bureaus, preventing unnecessary expenditures, creating greater and less-costly efficiency. In both Senate and House labor legislation—sound, just, worth-while labor legislation—is being formulated.

If this Congress in 6 months gives the country worth-while labor legislation, ends the abuses which have been and are being practiced by some Government agencies, it will have done a real worth-while job. The House is well on its way to do just that, so—

DON'T BE IMPATIENT

Your Representatives are on the job, and they are working—you have no idea just how continuously, earnestly.

Unless all signs fail, the people will get at least the major portion of what they want, and that right soon.

For 14 long years this thing has been building up. It can't be taken apart all at once, or in a few moments. When you wreck a skyscraper you don't blow it up by dynamite; you take it apart piece by piece, beginning at the top, then erect a new, a better structure. That is just what we are doing with the left-wing, communistic, New Deal machine. The days of borrowing and spending, of giving away America, are, we hope, at an end.

Sincerely,

CLARE E. HOFFMAN,
Your Representative.

FEBRUARY 8, 1947.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HALE (at the request of Mr. KILBURN) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address he delivered at Asheville, N. C.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SIKES] is recognized for 15 minutes.

ALASKA

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, after the adjournment of the Seventy-ninth Congress, a subcommittee of the House Committee on Military Affairs made an official visit to a number of our Pacific military establishments. The committee had a threefold responsibility. It was charged with the study of installations, observation of troop morale, and the investigation of surplus-property disposal. A number of statements on these subjects were issued while our work was in progress and immediately upon our return to this country.

Some of our recommendations were promptly put into effect by the services. All of them were given careful attention and study. At all times we were accorded courtesy and full cooperation by the representatives of our Government, both military and civilian.

It is my desire to speak in detail from time to time regarding specific phases of the committee's findings. I wish to emphasize the fact that I do not speak for the committee. The statements that I make are my own analysis.

Today I beg your indulgence while I talk about Alaska. To me its present-day importance to the defense of this hemisphere has never been adequately stressed.

The continuing development of aircraft is materially altering the basic concepts of American defense. No longer, for instance, do the historic Hawaiians hold the key to our western approaches. The mortar is barely dry in the magnificent post Pearl Harbor fortifications but there is little likelihood that they will ever be subjected to attack by enemy nations.

Alaska and the Aleutians now hold the spotlight. They are the key to the back door of American defense. Who controls Alaska and the Aleutians, controls the north Pacific. But these have no fortifications such as Pearl Harbor inspired in the Hawaiians. They are wide open to attack. And there will not be time to fortify them after the next Pearl Harbor.

To most Americans, Alaska is a vague, faraway land of snow and ice. They know that Seward—or somebody—bought it from the Russians for seven and one-half millions and was roundly criticised for his pains; that fur, fish, and gold made it a paying proposition. That is about as far as it goes.

Most of us do not realize that Alaska is only 7 or 8 hours by air from the United States mainland. Certainly we have failed to grasp the fact that Alaska and the Aleutians are now within bombing range of Tokyo, Vladivostok, Honolulu, San Francisco, or Detroit. Yes, Alaska is within bombing range of Detroit, within reach of the industrial heart of the United States, and this is the day of guided missiles, pilotless planes, and atomic bombs.

There is another factor to consider. Japan and much of the Far East are nearer via Alaska and the Aleutians by several hundreds of miles than the present westward route through the Hawaiians. The great circle air route to the East is already in operation.

Alaska is strange and silent and filled with scenic grandeur. It is spread over an area nearly as large as the continental United States. In that far-flung area are 90,000 souls—over a third of them Eskimos, Indians or Aleuts. Temperatures vary widely. The treeless, windswept Aleutians are seldom colder than 10 above or hotter than 60. But central and northern Alaska have terrific winters which send the thermometer to 60 below and midsummer heat that drives it above 80.

The Territory has magnificent harbors like Whittier which is ice-free all year and can float any ship. But by contrast it has harbors which are ice-bound much of the year. Nome is closed 9 months out of 12, and if you want a real cold-weather port there is Point Barrow whose harbor is open 1 month in the year.

Ice-choked harbors and great distances have produced transportation problems which long held back Alaskan development. But that was before the day of the airplane. Surprising though it may be, winter flying in Alaska no longer offers major difficulties. In fact, it is now but little more hazardous than winter flying in northern United States. Alaska's bush pilots were the real pioneers in Arctic aviation. Some of them flew ski-equipped old crates, and held them together with baling wire, but they flew. They learned Arctic flying the hard way, and many of them did not get through. That was the price for pioneering. When the military brought modern facilities and adequate controls Arctic flying lost much of its danger.

Because Arctic flying no longer presents unusual difficulties and because the Arctic approach is considered tomorrow's logical route to Europe and Asia, the Territory of Alaska has suddenly become the Pacific's most important outpost. The Pacific defenses on which the United States relied for half a century are now bypassed and outflanked by relatively undefended Alaska.

Aviation's great forward strides appear to have been accentuated rather than lessened since the end of the war. But even during World War II, Alaska bridged the gap from our west coast to northern Europe. The Territory proved to be a natural stop for lend-lease planes bound for Russia. During the war, 9,000 American planes were delivered to the Russians, principally at Fairbanks, and flown by them via Nome and Siberia to the eastern front.

They can come back the same way.

But let us consider tomorrow's war. I am not one of those who anticipates early conflict or who feels that another war is inevitable, but I decry the habit of hiding our heads in the sand and refusing to admit its possibility or its consequences. In tomorrow's war, rockets with a range of 3,000 miles are an admitted probability. Pilotless planes already are here. The time will come when both can be loaded with atomic bombs. Every military power is studying launching sites for radio-controlled weapons, its own launching sites and its neighbors'. Alaska and the Aleutians offer sites as important as any in the world. There are powers which appreciate the importance of these sites. Apparently we are not one of these, for we are doing little or nothing toward their development.

Yes; Alaska is now one of the key points in America's defense, a key point which is thinly held and easily isolated. It may be tomorrow's Pearl Harbor—with far more disastrous consequences.

Take a look at the military picture inside Alaska. There is not a completely modern base in the Territory. But there are three principal military establishments. They are Fort Richardson and Ladd Field on the mainland and Adak in the Aleutians. Fort Richardson is the base of supplies. A glance at the map will show you that the Aleutian chain and the Arctic wastes form the flanks which guard the approach to Alaska.

Ladd Field is a well organized post from which arctic warfare tests are being conducted at the present time. Its communications are now too weak to support a major operation, but they offer fine potentialities for the development of a powerful base. It is the terminus of the Alcan Highway. This 2,600-mile highway is unpaved but if kept open it can support considerable military traffic. It was completed at great cost during the war, and despite the drawback of length, it is a valuable asset. There is a similar highway from Ladd Field to Fort Richardson.

Also highly important is the Alaska Railroad, which joins these points. It is owned and operated by the United States Government. The railroad is worn out, but it is valuable as an alternate link between Ladd Field and its base of supplies. It was built as a pioneer project during the First World War, although not completed until some years later. Except for the barest maintenance it has since been neglected. A mistaken sense of economy has brought it to the point where it can handle but a very few hundreds of tons of freight daily. This capacity is inconsequential in view of the tremendous tonnage requirements of modern warfare. A PWA project to modernize the road at a cost of $12,000,000 was turned down just before World War II. Now it will cost $32,000,000. The road has reached the point that it is nearly worthless, but it is too important to the defense of Alaska to be permitted to close.

There is a pipe line which runs from Ladd Field to Skagway and to the costly Canol project at Norman Wells. No oil went through the pipe line during the war, but the link to the coast is now in use. It is only a 3-inch line, laid along the top of the ground, which means small capacity, added danger of sabotage, and more costly upkeep. But the line helps.

During the war the Army built a road from Haines, ice free port in southeastern Alaska, connecting with the Alcan Highway, something over a hundred miles away. Much of this road runs through Canadian territory. It is of great strategic significance. It should be maintained and improved throughout the entire distance to Fairbanks.

Fort Richardson can be serviced through harbors at Whittier or Seward. The distance to Whittier is only half as great as that to Seward, and the latter route requires much costlier railway installations. This is because of steep mountain passes and it means higher freight rates. In my opinion there is a definite need for early construction of a highway which will connect Seward and Anchorage. Once this highway is completed—much of it is already built—Whittier can be utilized exclusively for railroad traffic and the harbor at Seward will provide an alternate gateway to interior Alaska. This highway would also promote settlement of Kenai Peninsula, an area of great potentialities.

These are the supply lines for the defense of the Alaska mainland. They are barely adequate for comparatively light peacetime requirements. Climatic and geographic obstacles make rapid modernization difficult. Should emergency overloads suddenly be required, the situation would be a very serious one.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIKES. I yield.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. In connection with the Alaskan defenses has the War Department a plan for the defense of Alaska?

Mr. SIKES. There are such plans.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Is the gentleman familiar with those plans?

Mr. SIKES. Reasonably so.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Would the gentleman care to enlighten the House on those plans?

Mr. SIKES. Not at this time. I am confident the gentleman realizes it would not be proper to give out information which includes some confidential material of strategic importance. If the gentleman will permit me to continue, however, I will touch on some of the defense needs of Alaska and I judge this to be the information the gentleman actually desires.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. May I ask this question of my colleague from Florida in connection with the projects he has just mentioned: Are they included in the current appropriation?

Mr. SIKES. No, unfortunately most of them are not. They involve expenditures for modernization which the Department is reluctant to request at this time.

Now, to continue my discussion, Mr. Speaker, the Aleutian defenses are more highly developed and communications which are by sea are simpler.

The presence of Jap forces in the Aleutians during the war provided sufficient impetus to insure the construction of first-class bases, but it is doubtful that these meet present-day requirements. Adak was to have been the base of operations for the bombing and invasion of the northern Japanese Islands. All in all, the 1,700-mile Aleutian chain is a powerful weapon and a great military asset. But they must be kept abreast of the developments of modern warfare.

The other flank is thinly held. Extending from Point Barrow eastward, it is almost completely open. Its strength lies in its difficult terrain. In summer it is considered impossible to traverse the vast reaches of tundra and muskeg with large land forces. In winter when the frozen surface would permit mobility the problems of maintaining ground units are greatly magnified. However, no front can now safely be neglected.

That brings up Nome. It is one of the big question marks in Alaskan defense. Nome lies across the Bering Straits from Siberia, and it is virtually undefended. At their narrowest point the Straits are only 30 miles wide. Military strategists say this is unimportant because of the difficulty of maintaining a striking force and exploiting its presence in the Nome area. This may or may not be true. Nome admittedly would be difficult to exploit, but less so than the area farther north.

Study should also be made of the possibilities of developing facilities at Teller, north of Nome. There is located the best harbor on the entire Arctic Coast.

During most of the year the Straits are frozen. Desk generals say it is not feasible for a striking force to attempt a crossing on ice. It has not been tried, so no one really knows. But the Eskimos cross it constantly. Tribes on opposite sides of the Straits exchange visits and intermarry. Alaskan scouts who have operated patrols with dog teams in the frozen north—and officers who have not been tied to a desk too long—say that crossings on the ice are feasible for a dispersed force of 5,000 to 6,000 men. Dispersal would eliminate excessive weight at one point on the ice. Once on the Alaska mainland, the Yukon would provide a frozen highway to the interior. Poor visibility would operate in favor of such forces and they could prove important in supplying and supporting paratroopers.

There is a dangerous hint of complacence in the attitude of many of our military people toward Alaska. Particularly is this true of northern Alaska, where too much confidence is being placed in natural obstacles which new equipment and new methods can bridge. They are forgetting that determined people find a way to overcome obstacles. For instance, there were those who said that the Japs could not take the Malay Peninsula. They, too, placed their faith in natural obstacles. Military logic showed that the jungle and British sea power would keep invaders out of Singapore, the key to the East Indies. Consequently the peninsular was weakly defended. History reminds us that the Japs were not impressed by British logic. They overran the jungles in a matter of weeks and Singapore fell. The fall of Ladd Field to a force operating from Nome would seriously jeopardize the defense of Alaska, and it might force the evacuation of the Territory.

I mentioned the fact that the Army is conducting cold-weather maneuvers in the frozen northland. Arctic warfare is something we know almost nothing about, and it cannot be learned from textbooks. Men have to live it if they are to understand it. There is a reason for our interest in Arctic warfare. Observers who have kept abreast of the times know that Arctic warfare studies now hold a place in the military spotlight of primary importance.

This is true because it is almost certain that any military threat which may develop for our country during this generation will come across the Arctic regions. What the Army learns in its Arctic warfare tests may help to prevent another Pearl Harbor. But more is required than maneuvers. What we do now about the defense of Alaska may prevent that strategic area from serving as a base of operations against the United States if there should be another Pearl Harbor. And by the same token Alaska when properly fortified, may serve as a strong brake to the military ambitions of the next crop of would-be world dictators.

We shall not seek war. History attests to that. The more significant fact is that we have never been prepared when war came. Each time we have paid dearly in men and money for unpreparedness, but we have had time to get ready.

Warfare today is different. It moves with amazing speed. It strikes with terrifying force. We shall never again have time to prepare after it comes. A strong defense is our only security, and a strong defense can mean that we shall not again be attacked.

If war should come again for us, Alaska may be the first battleground. Changed factors of warfare have made it the new back door of American defense. Today that door is open. Tomorrow such a condition may be fatal to the security of this Nation. A relatively undefended Alaska even in times of world peace and apparent security is an intolerable condition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ANGELL). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MANASCO] is recognized for 15 minutes.

(Mr. MANASCO asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include certain newspaper and magazine articles.)

DANGEROUS REDUCTION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR ARMED FORCES MAY RESULT IN WORLD WAR III

Mr. MANASCO. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday next we will be called upon to vote on one of the most important resolutions I think any Congress of the United States has ever been called upon to consider. Our decision on that resolution may well determine whether or not there will be another world war and, therefore, I think it most important that we not only stop, but read and remember, past history and past actions of the American people and the American Congress in our program and appropriations for national defense.

Mr. Speaker, it is high time that we Members of Congress start giving serious consideration to the problems confronting our country. Here of late there has been quite a lot of talk about reducing taxes 20 percent, about balancing the Federal Budget, reducing Government expenditures, and about paying the national debt. I know that all of us would like to reduce taxes at least 20 percent, but I seriously doubt the wisdom of such action at this time.

Let us examine for a moment the possibilities of reducing our taxes 20 percent, at the same time balancing the Budget, and making substantial reductions in the public debt.

Mr. Speaker, I may say it might be a little more difficult for the Government to borrow money at the low rate of interest we are now borrowing it if we have competition from industry and from other borrowers that may raise the interest rate.

Today, most of the war agencies have either been liquidated or are in the process of liquidation, leaving only what we commonly refer to as the old-line departments and the permanent independent agencies. We will have to pay a little over $5,000,000,000 interest annually on the public debt. This year we will pay out, under present authorizations, about $7,500,000,000 in veterans' benefits. The entire appropriation for our old-line agencies and independent establishments, exclusive of commitments resulting from war activities, the Veterans' Administration, and the War and Navy Departments, will amount to about $4,500,000,000. If we were to abolish these old-line agencies and independent establishments, our budget could be reduced little more than $4,500,000,000.

Of course, it is idle fancy to even suggest the abolition of these departments and agencies. The only departments in which any material reduction can be made in the appropriations for the next fiscal year are the appropriations for the War and Navy Departments. All of us would like to be able to abolish forever the necessity of having an Army, Navy, and an Air Force. We had high hopes 2 years ago, when the United Nations was born, that man had at last arrived at a program that would insure lasting peace. We are happy over the progress made by the United Nations Organization, but I feel that this body has a long way to go before it develops to the point where we can assume with some degree of certainty that the machinery set up to keep down aggressors and prevent future wars is sufficiently strong to accomplish this noble purpose.

Until we are convinced that there will never be another war on this or any other continent, we will be practicing foolish economy in reducing the appropriations for our armed forces to the danger point.

I hear many people say that unless we reduce taxes we cannot restore our economy and make progress as we have in the past. Reduction of taxes and failure to appropriate sufficient funds for our Army and our Navy has already cost the American people over $400,000,000,000 to say nothing of the lives of over 350,000 men whose losses cannot be measured in dollars and cents, and to say nothing of the one and one-half million who were wounded in mind and body and whose sacrifices cannot be measured in dollars and cents. It is true another war is not looming over the horizon, but the same thing was true in the 1920's and early thirties.

Many of us recall that after the shooting was over in World War I, the statesmen of all nations had proclaimed far and wide that that was the last war and that machinery would be set up to insure lasting peace. Many proposals were advanced.

The leading proposal was that of the League of Nations, followed by the World Court, world disarmament and so forth. The American people at that time were loaded with a war debt of less than $40,000,000,000. Our people were screaming from the housetops then, as they are now, to reduce taxes and balance the Budget. Taxes were reduced, the Budget was balanced and substantial payments were made on the war debt but at what a tragic cost to the security of our country! Then, as now, the only departments where substantial reductions could be made in our national expenditures were the appropriations for the Army, Navy, and Air Forces.

I might add at this point that we did one of the greatest favors to the German Nation after World War I that has ever been done to any nation when we scrapped all of their war machines. It made them start out on new research and a new program of rearmament. They did not have the old World War I 75-millimeter guns and machine guns the French had defending the Maginot line in 1941. They had new equipment. And when a lot of us look around the airfields and see all of these B–17's, B–24's, B–29's, P–51's, and P–80's and think that we have the protection that we might need in case of another war, we are lulling ourselves into false security. All those planes today are obsolete; they were obsolescent the day the war ended, and we cannot afford to think that we are adequately prepared at the present time with such outmoded equipment.

We came out of World War I as a leader in world affairs. We were not then ready to assume our newly won leadership and decided to again isolate ourselves from the problems of other peoples, feeling secure that the two oceans separating us from the rest of the world were all the defenses that we needed. We refused to enter the League of Nations.

I doubt now that our entry into the League of Nations would have prevented World War II, but I am firmly convinced that if we had continued to appropriate adequate funds for our Army and our Navy such aggressors as Adolf Hitler, Benito Mussolini, and the war lords of Japan would never have dared attack helpless countries like China, Austria, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Ethiopia, and maybe Pearl Harbor. We now know that our own Civil War could have been prevented if the United States had been prepared.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANASCO. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. In my opinion, if we had followed the advice of Gen. "Billy" Mitchell 20 years ago, there would never have been any Pearl Harbor.

Mr. MANASCO. I think the gentleman is right.

Mr. RANKIN. We would have had an air force that would have commanded the respect of the world, and the chances are that we might have headed off this last World War entirely.

Mr. MANASCO. That is what I am trying to say. We now know that our own Civil War could have been prevented. We did not have enough Federal troops under arms—and I am a Southerner—to quell what was termed at that time a rebellion. I think we are just as much responsible, due to our failure to assume our responsibilities as world leaders, for the rise to power of these war lords as were the people of Germany, Italy, and Japan. I realize that this is a serious charge to make against the American people, but a careful examination of events following World War I will convince any open-minded person of this responsibility.

America is not now, and I hope never will be, an aggressor nation, but unless we want to assume the responsibility of the rise of another tyrant who may be successful in destroying civilization, we must continue to appropriate sufficient funds to insure the strongest and best-equipped Army, Navy, and Air Force of any country in the world. If we do this, we will insure lasting peace.

Soon after World War I, we were led to believe that unless taxes were drastically reduced, business could not expand sufficiently to take care of the pent-up demands for consumer goods, and that our manufacturers of durable goods could not satisfy domestic demands, let alone secure a fair share of international trade. Taxes were reduced, the budget for the Army and Navy was drastically cut, millions of dollars were invested in Florida real estate, purchased at inflated values, hundreds of apartment houses were constructed, plants were expanded, and a terrific boom in the stock market followed. When the crash came many fortunes were wiped out. The auctioneers foreclosing mortgages on farms, homes, apartments, and factories were about the only people left who were gainfully employed. Plant after plant was closed as a result of saturated markets and then a period of deficit spending followed. We, of course, realize that unless the Federal Government had stepped in in the early thirties to prevent widespread starvation, we would have been faced with a revolution. Our national income dropped to such a dangerous level that it was impossible for us to appropriate sufficient funds at that time to rebuild our armed forces, although all of us must have realized that another war was brewing.

Unless we make substantial reductions in our staggering national debt now while our national income is at a high level, we will be unable to meet the interest payments if and when another depression comes. Since we have no assurance that our country will never again be faced with the threat of war, we must make substantial debt reductions from year to year so that if we are again faced with a crisis we can raise sufficient funds to meet the crisis without having to repudiate our debt. It is a matter of common knowledge that if we ever have to repudiate our debt, our system of free enterprise will be destroyed and all industry and all small business will be nationalized. I wonder if we are willing to run this risk and pay the penalty in years to come that might result in our shortsightedness in reducing taxes?

No one yet has been able to forecast a buyers' strike with any degree of certainty and so far in our history no one has been able to give a satisfactory reason for such a strike after it has occurred. For that reason, we cannot stake our security on the basis of a continued national gross income of near $200,000,000,000 per year for a sufficient length of time to provide a satisfactory, long-term debt-retirement program. Our tremendous debt is a heavy mortgage on every business and industry in this country. Until it is substantially reduced, we cannot hope for a long period of prosperity. Unless we make substantial payments on the debt, unborn generations will be burdened with heavy taxes and sooner or later our country will lose its position as a world power.

I should like to refer now to the February 18, 1947, issue of the magazine World Report, which I think all of us should read every week. It contains very valuable information about some of the cuts that are being proposed now.

In this budget we have $444,000,000 to be spent during the next fiscal year for atomic energy. In view of the fact that thousands of people are employed at Oak Ridge and other plants, I think all of us agree that that program should be carried on. We cannot afford to cut that for the sake of our own security.

Neither can we afford to cut the merchant marine, which is an essential part of our national defense program, although we let it go down to almost nothing after World War I, and it cost between eighteen and twenty billion dollars to rebuild a merchant marine which is largely obsolete today. We have to spend money on a merchant marine unless we want to spend billions of dollars and take thousands of men out of production of other essential war materials in case of another war, to rebuild old Liberty ships, because these will rust out, I hope, before we ever have another war. But we cannot afford to cut that agency's appropriation too much.

We also must spend a large amount of money trying to expand our foreign trade. Unless this is done, the standard of living Americans have will be reduced.

I do not like a lot of the propaganda that is going out of this country to other countries. I think it should be screened. I think we could do a lot toward teaching other people that our country is not the type of country that some of our information bureaus are trying to lead them to believe. I think we can do a great service by telling the people of other countries that we believe in hard work, we believe in saving a little money, and that we cannot continue to pour out billions of dollars to keep the other countries' economy going. We do have a selfish interest in increasing the purchasing power of other countries, for unless we do that it will be impossible for us to be an exporting nation. We are going to have to do a little importing if we expect to export much, because we have about drained all the dollars out of the other countries except those we are lending dollars.

For selfish reasons, for humanitarian reasons, and for world peace, let us keep a strong Army, a strong Air Force, a strong Navy, and an adequate scientific research organization or else let us be frank and assume the responsibility of another war which is sure to come if we reduce our armed forces to an innocuous state.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANASCO. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I congratulate the gentleman on his very timely and appropriate address, which in my opinion is a very powerful contribution, particularly at this time when there is so much talk of the Congress sharply reducing the appropriations for the Army, the Navy, and the Air Forces, because at this time we must maintain our power, above all, for our own national interest.

Mr. MANASCO. I am sure there are men in the councils of other countries who are laughing up their sleeves at our proposal to cut our armed forces drastically at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. NODAR (at the request of Mr. MASON) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein excerpts from an address I made on this floor in 1945, and also to include some excerpts from the law of the State of New York on the subject I am about to discuss.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I was amused at the address of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] and very much interested in what he said. He talked about the slowness with which the leaders of his party proceed in passing labor legislation. I also noticed in the paper that the Senate leaders were going to wait on the House, and the House leaders were going to wait on the Senate.

It reminded me of what I heard over the radio the other night. Somebody was reading the laws of a certain State on traffic regulations which provided that when two cars approach a crossing at right angles they both must come to a dead stop, and each one of them must remain in that position until the other one has passed on. I am just wondering if that is the kind of stalemate we are running into, and if we are going to come to that kind of a dead standstill, with each House remaining in that position until the other one has acted.

But, Mr. Speaker, I arose to discuss a measure introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] for the recreation of the now defunct FEPC, or the so-called Fair Employment Practice Committee.

I believe Mr. DIRKSEN made a speech for such a measure in the last Congress, which reminded me of the colored preacher who told his congregation that he was "goin to preach to you an ole 'postolic injunction, 'Take no heed of what you shall say.'"

It would certainly take a genius to reconcile that speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and this FEPC bill he has introduced with his recent speech against communism, especially since that FEPC is the chief plank in the Communist platform.

It is the most dangerous piece of communistic legislation with which this country has ever been threatened in all its history. I am going to show what it would do to the people of Illinois by pointing out what it is doing to the people of New York, where this vicious measure was written into the laws of that State without consulting the people who are suffering under it.

All these bills contain the same old bunk about making it a crime to discriminate in employment because of "race, creed, color, natural origin, or ancestry," and so forth.

Before Mr. DIRKSEN attempts to ram this monstrosity down the throats of the people of Illinois, and all the other States, I suggest he do as they did in California, let the people of Illinois vote on it. That is what they did in California in the last election, and it was defeated by a majority in every single individual county in California.

Now let us see what such a measure is doing to the people of the State of New York.

A man from New York said to me this morning, "You know this measure is being operated in New York simply by failure to operate it." The other night there were two men from New York in a taxicab here in Washington driven by a man who works here on the Hill. They got into an argument. One of them said, "I told you this FEPC would ruin the State of New York if they ever put it on the statute books." The other one said, "I did not think so. I thought it was a humanitarian measure. But I now see my mistake."

Then the other man said, "Here is what it has done to me. I own a good home," I believe he said "out on Riverside Drive, and I also own a house next to it which I bought for my own protection. I had a friend living in the other house, but his business took him to another section of the country and he had to vacate. Like a fool, I put up a sign 'For rent,' thinking that someone in the community whom I could afford to rent it to would apply. Somebody put a colored fellow up to come and apply for it and the court now says I must let him have it."

I bring this to you for what it is worth. I understand the Communists in New York are demanding that the same rule be applied to rooms or apartments for rent.

But I want to read you some of the regulations that are now being imposed upon the people of the State of New York under this vicious law. Businessmen from New York tell me that the way they are getting around this measure is by operating through employment agencies, because no intelligent businessman would go to a State with that kind of law on its statute books and attempt to establish a new business or a new enterprise, especially with the regulations or rulings under it which I am now going to read to you.

Remember they put this measure on the ticket in California and the people voted on it in the last election; and it lost in every single individual county in California. It was beaten in the entire State by about 3 to 1.

You simply destroy business with a measure like this. That is what the FEPC did here. Men have gone out of business all over the country in the last few years because of the persecution that was carried on by this outfit here in Washington, the personnel of which I shall insert later on.

A few people are going around urging us to pass it as a national law, to put everybody else in the same predicament. These people who are carrying on this racial agitation are using the Negro as a smoke screen. They do not give a tinker's dam about the Negro. They are not trying to help the Negro. They are doing them more harm than anybody has in the last 50 years, and the decent law-abiding Negroes know it.

But let me show you what they have done in New York, and let me give you some of the regulations or rulings, as they are called, and ask you if you would like to have them in your State. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] how he would like to have them in Illinois, or how you would like to have them in Ohio, Indiana, Pennsylvania, or in Missouri, or in any other State in the Union.

Here are the regulations, or rulings, issued by the State of New York. They are headed:

"State of New York Executive Department. State Commission against discrimination. Rulings."

Here are the rulings:

I want to show you some things you cannot ask in the State of New York when you go to employ a man.

Remember that State has no gas, coal, or oil, and very little water power. The rest of the country does not have to go to New York, or to any other State to get what it needs in the years to come. The American people in every section of this country are in a position now to take care of themselves. You put this measure on in one State after another and you will simply penalize those States beyond reason, and when they ask you to pass it for the whole United States and put it on the entire American people, after the fiasco they have made of it here in Washington in the last few years, it is simply unthinkable to a man who knows what he is doing and has the interest of the people of the country at heart.

Here are some of the things you cannot do under the law of New York:

UNLAWFUL EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES BEFORE HIRING ANYBODY

Those words are written in capitals. Here is the first unlawful practice:

Inquiry into the original name of the applicant for employment, whose name has been changed by court proceedings or otherwise.

If you inquire as to his name or what his name used to be you violate the law. You commit an unlawful practice. For instance, take this man who writes for PM, who calls himself I. F. Stone. His name was Isadore Feinstein, as Cordell Hull once pointed out. Suppose he comes to you asking for employment and you ask him that question. Then you will have committed an unlawful act.

Here is the next one:

It would be unlawful practice to make—

Inquiry into the birthplace of the applicant for employment, the birthplace of his parents, spouse, or other close relative.

How would you like that in Iowa, Illinois, Texas, or Nebraska? In California I know you do not like it, because you have just voted on it.

Here is the next "unlawful practice":

Requirement that the applicant for employment produce a birth certificate or baptismal certificate.

That would be an unlawful practice under this FEPC Act in New York.

I was surprised to see Governor Dewey get his mustache in the wringer on this proposition. I do not see how he is ever going to get loose from it.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. MASON. What about this requirement during the war that every person employed in certain industries had to prove that he was born here before he could get a job?

Mr. RANKIN. Certainly. If we had had this law all over the country then, the Japs would have had a spy at the elbow of every man in a key position; so would the Germans, and so would every other enemy country.

I thank the gentleman from Illinois for his timely suggestion.

It is an unlawful practice in New York, under this law, to make—

Inquiry into the religious denomination of an applicant for employment, his religious affiliations, his church, parish pastor, or religious holidays observed. Inquiry into whether an applicant for employment is an atheist.

Inquiry into whether an applicant for employment is an atheist is forbidden, although you may be publishing literature for the Methodist Church, the Baptist Church, or any other denomination.

Another thing, an applicant for employment—and I am reading from the rules laid down by this Commission:

An applicant for employment may not be told that this is a Catholic, Protestant, or Jewish organization.

In other words, if you are in the business of publishing religious literature you cannot even give him that information under this law which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] now proposes for the whole country, including Illinois.

Here is another unlawful practice:

An applicant for employment may not be told that the following holidays will be observed by the firm and no others, naming the holidays; e. g., Decoration Day and July the Fourth, etc.

You cannot tell them under the laws, rulings, and regulations of the State of New York that they may observe the Fourth of July.

Here is another unlawful practice:

An applicant for employment may not be told that employees are required to work Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur.

Frankly, I did not know there were any such days until the last few years.

Another thing, it is an unlawful practice under this New York law to make—

Inquiry into the complexion of an applicant for employment.

Inquire into his complexion and you are likely to get yourself tangled up with the law of the State of New York.

Here is another unlawful practice:

Requirement that an applicant for employment annex a photograph.

That would be an unlawful employment practice. You are not supposed to know how he looks.

Remember, this is not in Russia, but in New York.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. MASON. And yet the State Department in order to grant a visa requires a photograph of the person to be presented with his application.

Mr. RANKIN. Certainly, and they ought to do so. Much as I respect the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON], I certainly would not want to employ him unless I knew how he looked. If I had never seen him, I would certainly want to see his picture.

Here is another unlawful practice:

Inquiry whether an applicant for employment is a naturalized or native-born citizen; the date when the applicant acquired citizenship; whether the applicant's parents or spouse are naturalized or native-born citizens of the United States; the date when such parents or spouse acquired citizenship.

You cannot inquire into those questions under this FEPC law in New York.

Here is another unlawful practice:

Requirement that an applicant for employment produce his naturalization papers or first papers.

He may lie to you and tell you that he is a naturalized citizen, but you cannot ask to see his papers.

Another unlawful practice in New York is to—Inquire into the lineage of an applicant for employment, his ancestry, or national origin.

You remember a few years ago the Dallas News inserted an advertisement for a colored janitor, and this FEPC outfit down the street, ordered them to take it out, said it was an unlawful practice.

One member of this FEPC outfit here in Washington went into the office of Swift & Co. in Chicago. This FEPC man asked them: "How many Negroes do you have on your board of directors?"

The answer was "None."

Then the FEPC man asked him: "Why haven't you?"

That was the FEPC down here in Washington a few years ago before it died because a few radicals could not browbeat Congress into perpetuating it.

But it is now in force in the State of New York.

Here is another unlawful practice under the New York law:

Inquiry into the location of places of business of relatives of an applicant for employment.

It is an unlawful practice to make—

Inquiry into the place of residence of the parents, spouse, or other close relatives of an applicant for employment.

I am reading from the records at Albany.

Here is another unlawful practice:

Inquiry into the maiden name of the wife of a male applicant for employment and/or inquiry into the maiden name of the mother of a male or female applicant for employment.

The other day we had the Eislers down here. One of them has been shown to be representing the Comintern, according to his sister's testimony. He has a brother out in California, who seems to be poisoning the public mind through the moving-picture industry. He tries to defend his brother and refers to this woman as "my former sister." If you wanted to employ any of them and check the name of at least one of them as given here, you could not inquire into those names at all—if you are trying to do business in the State of New York—even though one of them has a half dozen aliases. You could not even ask where they came from or when they got here or when they changed their names.

Here is another unlawful practice, in New York:

Inquiry into the general military experience of an applicant for employment.

I wish every ex-serviceman could read that, and the next one.

Here it is. It is an unlawful practice to make—

Inquiry into the whereabouts of an applicant for employment during the First World War, i. e., during the period from 1914 to 1919.

In other words, inquiry as to his whereabouts in the period from 1914 to 1919 is forbidden as an unlawful practice in the State of New York.

Is that what you want in Colorado? Is that what you want in Massachusetts?

Mr. GIFFORD. We have it.

Mr. RANKIN. Get rid of it, and we will help you.

Is that what you want in Kansas, in Ohio, and in other States?

Let your States vote on it. Michigan is going to vote on it right away. If you will tell the people of Michigan the whole truth, let them know the whole truth about this monstrosity, I will guarantee you they will beat it worse than they did in California.

Here is another unlawful practice:

Inquiry into the organizations of which an applicant for employment is a member, including, organizations the name or character of which indicates the religion, race, or national origin of its members.

I presume, if they should ask me if I am a member of the Masonic lodge, I could have them jerked up and brought before this inquisition board or probably prosecuted at various places throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, I am not criticizing the people of New York. I have long since learned in going from one State to another that real Americans are about the same everywhere. I believe if they had a vote on it the people of New York would beat it, just as they did in California.

They are having a vote on it in Michigan because a little minority group has been attempting to browbeat the Legislature of Michigan into passing it. I dare say when it goes on the ballot in Michigan and the people of Michigan understand what it means they will defeat it more thoroughly than they did in California. The same thing would happen in probably every other State in the Union.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman tell us what the penalties are in New York?

Mr. RANKIN. In addition to being harassed to death with orders and directives to cease, desist, rehire, and so forth, there is a punishment provided of "imprisonment in a penitentiary or county jail for not more than 1 year or by fine of not more than $500, or by both."

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. I want to remind the gentleman that we have that law in Massachusetts.

Mr. RANKIN. I was afraid of that.

Mr. GIFFORD. I was thoroughly amazed when I looked into it; I had not learned what the rules were. But, perhaps we carried it too far. I am so sorry, and I have been, and I am not in favor of this, I can assure the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. I know the gentleman is not, and I am sure the people of Massachusetts would not favor it if they had a vote on it.

Mr. GIFFORD. Employers always inquire and must know whether you come from a respectable family or not. They are so careful. Perhaps they overdid it. But I think a man ought to be able to find out whether he came from a respectable family.

Mr. RANKIN. There are a great many questions that should be asked, which are forbidden under this law.

Mr. Speaker, in order to give the new Members an idea of what a mess this FEPC was here in Washington during its existence under Executive order, I insert a speech I made on this subject in 1945.

It reads as follows:

FEPC A BETRAYAL OF WHITE AMERICANS

(Speech of Hon. JOHN E. RANKIN, of Mississippi, in the House of Representatives, Thursday, July 12, 1945)

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, the passage of a law at this time legalizing this so-called FEPC would be a betrayal of the white people of the country. If every individual in the United States could understand just what it means, there would be such a roar of protest coming from every State in this Union that it would never see the light of day.

If every Member of Congress would "screw his courage to the sticking place" and vote his convictions on this so-called FEPC, it would not get 50 votes out of the entire membership of 435.

It is a most dangerous and brazen attempt to fasten upon the white people of America the worst system of control by alien or minority racial groups that has been known since the crucifixion.

When I read the names of the personnel of this outfit you will understand what I mean.

To sanctify this organization by law would give the lie to everything we have told our American boys they were fighting for. Instead of coming back to liberty, freedom, and democracy, they would find themselves sold into this bondage, herded, humiliated, and regimented by alien influences directed by a foreign comintern representing the deadly doctrine of Karl Marx that is based upon hatred for Christianity and for everything that is based on Christian principles.

It is a manifestation in legislative form of that infidelity that has closed thousands of Christian churches in Europe and been responsible for the murder of untold millions of Christian human beings.

This measure is not directed altogether at the white people of the South. If it were, you folks in the North would not have so much ground for alarm. We in the South know how to combat subversive elements. As Henry Grady once said, we wrested the South from such domination "when Federal drum beats rolled nearer and Federal bayonets hedged closer to the ballot box of the South than it ever will again in this Republic."

But you people in the North have not had that training, and this FEPC is likely to bring grief, strife, hatred, race riots, and chaos in your northern cities if this vicious agency is perpetuated and sanctioned by your votes.

Do not forget that the returning servicemen know what this thing means, and they are going to call you to account next year—beginning with the primary. They are not going to wait until the general election.

Do not forget that every businessman, every farmer, every professional man, and every other independent individual whose blood glows with the instinct of American liberty, is going to join these men, and those other patriotic forces that are fighting to save American institutions for which these boys have been fighting and dying upon every battlefield in the world.

If every man and every woman in the United States could just read the list of individuals that compose the personnel of this crazy FEPC, and its subdivisions throughout the country, I dare say there would not be enough of you left who vote for it, even if nominated in the primaries next year, to form a corporal's guard.

For your information, and for the information of the American people generally, I am going to read you the official personnel as it exists today. Remember, this list is taken from the official record. This is the group that wants to nose into and control every business in the United States. Remember, they can search the files and records of every business establishment in America where some disgruntled individual is willing to trump up a charge of discrimination. They can drag them all over the country and try them, and in that way destroy any ordinary business concern.

The next thing they are going to try to do is get control of your schools and force their communistic henchmen into the schools and teach your children their subversive doctrines.

Read these lists carefully, which, as I said, are taken from the official records here in Washington, and you will see that not one out of ten on these rolls is a white Gentile American.

Here is the official list:

Committee on Fair Employment Practice, Washington, D. C., Office of the Chairman

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Ross, Malcolm	Chairman	White	$8,000
Johnson, George M.	Deputy Chairman.	Colored	8,000
Hubbard, Maceo	Hearings examiner.	do	5,600
Bloch, Emanuel	do	White	5,600
Copper, Evelyn	do	do	5,600
Berking, Max	Assistant to Chairman.	do	3,800
Alexander, Dorothy	Secretary to Chairman.	Colored	2,600
Clifton, J. Jeanne	Secretary to Deputy.	do	2,000
Brooks, Mary	Clerk-stenographer.	do	1,800
Banting, Myra	do	White	1,800

You will note that in this office of the chairman, consisting of 10 people, there are 5 Negroes and 5 white people, most of whom have foreign names. One of the whites is a stenographer who receives the smallest salary of anyone on the list.

Remember that the members of this group preside over the destiny of every business enterprise in America, and are using their assumed powers to harass white Americans out of business.

This is the organization Members of Congress are being asked to perpetuate by the passage of this bill.

FIELD OPERATIONS

Here is the Division of Field Operations:

Field operations

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Maslow, Will	Chief	White	$6,500
Mitchell, Clarence	Principal fair-practice examiner.	Colored	5,600
Davidson, Eugene	do	do	5,600
Beall, W. Hayes	Senior fair-practice examiner.	White	4,600
Mercer, Inez	Fair-practice examiner.	do	3,800
Rogers, Eleanor	Clerk-stenographer.	Colored	1,800
Saito, Otome	do	Japanese-American.	1,800
Thompson, Mildred	do	Colored	1,800
Cornick, Emma	do	do	1,620

You will note that it consists of nine people—five Negroes, one Japanese, and three others—two of whom have records of affiliations with Communist-front organizations, according to the reports of the Dies committee.

Imagine this group going about over the country riding herd on the white American businessmen of the Nation, telling them whom they shall employ, whom they shall promote, and with whom they may associate.

It would be interesting, and probably enlightening, to check up on these people and see how many of them are native-born Americans.

Members of Congress had better do this now, before they get caught in this trap, because this question of un-American activities is going to be an issue in every congressional district next year, beginning with the primaries.

The people are not going to wait until the general election for someone who holds a commission as a result of the pernicious activities of Sidney Hillman and his gang to wrap the party cloak about him and shout to the people of his district that "I am a Republican" or "I am a Democrat."

More than 2,000,000 young men have already been discharged in this war, and they are organizing now to try to save America for Americans. They are going to read your records, and they are likely to ask you some very embarrassing questions when you get home.

REVIEW AND ANALYSIS DIVISION

Now look at this list and see who reviews all these records of racial discrimination when they come to Washington, and you will understand how the editor of the Dallas News felt and how other white gentiles feel, including Cecil B. DeMille, the great American movie producer, when they are harassed out of business.

Here is the list:

Review and Analysis Division

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Davis, John A	Chief	Colored	$5,600
Lawson, Marjorie	Research analyst.	do	3,800
Golightly, Cornelius	Compliance analyst.	do	3,200
Hemphill, India	do	do	2,600
Coan, Carol	do	White	2,600
Davis, Joy P	do	Colored	2,600
Hoffman, Celia	Clerk-stenographer.	White	1,800
Spaulding, Joan	do	Colored	1,800

You will note that it consists of six Negroes and two white people, one of whom is named Carol Coan and the other Celia Hoffman, a white stenographer receiving the lowest salary on the list.

Now, if you sign the petition to bring out this bill or vote for this monstrosity, do not forget that when you get home those white American businessmen who help to sustain this Nation in time of peace and whose sons are fighting its battles in time of war are going to want to ask you some questions that you may not be able to answer.

LEGAL DIVISION

But if you want a real laugh, look at this Legal Division.

Legal Division

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Reeves, Frank D	Attorney	Colored	$4,600
Stickgold, Simon	Attorney	White	4,600
Gordon Jernevive	Clerk-stenographer.	Colored	1,800

You will note that this so-called Legal Division consists of two Negroes and a Simon Stickgold.

INFORMATION DIVISION

Now we come to the Information Division. If you want information about this outfit, write to this Division:

Information Division

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Bourne, St. Clair	Information specialist.	Colored	$3,800
Whiting, Margaret	Clerk-stenographer.	Colored	1,800

You will note that it consists of two Negroes, one registered as an information specialist and the other as a clerk-stenographer.

BUDGET AND ADMINISTRATION

Now we come to the Budget and Administration Division. This Division not only makes up the budget but administers the regulations. Here is the list:

Budget and Administration

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Jones, Theodore	Chief	Colored	$5,600
Jeter, Sinclair	Assistant administrative officer.	do	3,200
Baker, Vivian D	Clerk-stenographer.	do	2,000
Jackson, Bosales A	Clerk-typist	do	1,620
Paynter, Minnie A	do	do	1,620
Hollomon, Irving	Clerk	do	1,440
Selby, Ralph R	Chief, fiscal	do	2,600
Ross, Sylvia B	Voucher auditor	do	2,000
elson, Otelia	Accounting clerk	do	1,620
Carpenter, Elizabeth.	do	do	1,620
Brent, Pearl T	do	do	1,620

This outfit, which is composed of 11 Negroes, and no whites at all, not only makes up the budget for financing this aggregation, but it seems to have the power of administration. I hope you will read this list to your white businessmen, farmers, and ex-servicemen at home when you get back and ask for renomination in the primaries next year.

MAIL AND FILES DIVISION

Now, here are the ones that have control of the mails and filing system:

Mail and Files

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Douglas, Lela	Chief, Mail and Files.	Colored	$2,000
Welch, Selena	Docket clerk	do	1,800
Gamble, Jessie	File clerk	do	1,620
Phillips, Rose	do	do	1,440
Reed, Charles	Messenger	do	1,380
Mitchell, Regina	File clerk	do	1,440

You will note that this division is composed entirely of Negroes—six Negroes, and no whites at all. I wonder why they discriminated against the white race in setting up these two powerful branches of this most dangerous agency?

REGIONAL OFFICE, NEW YORK

Now, let us turn to the regional offices and see who is going to harass the business people back in the States. Here is the list for the State of New York:

Regional office, New York

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Lawson, Edward H.	Regional director.	Colored	$5,600
Jones, Madison S	Fair-practice examiner.	do	3,800
Jones, Robert G	do	do	3,800
Donovan, Daniel R	do	White	3,800
Irish, Miriam	Clerk-stenographer.	Colored	2,000
Asepha, Tillie	do	White	1,620
Schwartz, Sonia	do	do	1,620

This is the list that is going to help Governor Dewey harass the white American businessmen of the Empire State. You will note that it is composed of four Negroes and three white people. Please read the names of the three white people and see if you can figure out their antecedents.

Businessmen of New York are going to have a hard time after this war without having all this communistic conglomeration to deal with, to say nothing of the one which Governor Dewey and his political henchmen have now heaped upon them.

REGIONAL OFFICE, PHILADELPHIA

Now, let us turn to Philadelphia, the birthplace of the Constitution—the City of Brotherly Love. At the risk of causing glorious old Benjamin Franklin to turn over in his grave, I read you the list:

Regional office, Philadelphia

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Fleming, G. James	Regional director.	Colored	$5,600
Greenblatt, Mildred.	Fair-practice examiner.	White	3,800
Manly, Milo A	do	Colored	3,800
Risk, Samuel R	do	White	3,800
Grinnage, Willard	do	Colored	3,200
Gorgas, Helen	Clerk-stenographer.	do	1,800
Klinger, Karyl	do	White	1,800
Brown, Grayce	do	Colored	1,440

You will note that it is composed of eight individuals—five Negroes and three whites, Mildred Greenblatt, Samuel R. Risk, and Karyl Klinger.

Don't you know there will be some brotherly love when that crowd gets going on the businessmen of the Philadelphia area?

REGIONAL OFFICE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Now, here is the regional office in Washington, D. C., the Nation's Capital, where there has been so much persecution of white gentiles in the last few years. Here is the list:

Regional office, Washington, D. C.

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Evans, Joseph	Regional director.	Colored	$5,600
Houston, Theophilus.	Fair-practice examiner.	do	3,200
Kahn, Alice	do	White	2,600
Chisolm, Ruby	Clerk-stenographer.	Colored	1,800
Urback, Dorothy	do	do	1,620

You will note it consists of four Negroes and Alice Kahn. Just what chance a white gentile will have with this group is entirely problematical, to say the least of it.

REGIONAL OFFICE, CLEVELAND

Now, let us move out where the West begins and take a look. Here is the list in the Cleveland regional office:

Regional office, Cleveland

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
McKnight, William.	Regional director.	Colored	$4,600
Abbott, Olcott R	Fair-practice examiner.	White	3,800
Glore, Lethia	do	Colored	3,200
Kelley, Berniza	Clerk-stenographer.	do	1,620
Wasem, Edna	do	White	1,800

You will note that this group is composed of three Negroes and two whites, Olcott R. Abbott and Edna Wasem.

Don't you know the white people of Cleveland will enjoy being dominated by them?

CINCINNATI REGIONAL OFFICE

Cincinnati seems to be largely under the jurisdiction of the Cleveland office since it only has two people:

Cincinnati

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
James, Harold	Fair-practice examiner.	White	$4,600
	Clerk-stenographer.		1,800

DETROIT REGIONAL OFFICE

Now let us move on to Detroit, Mich. Here is the regional office for Detroit:

Detroit

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Swan, Edward	Examiner in charge.	Colored	$4,600
Sese, Doris K	Clerk-stenographer.	Japanese-American.	1,620

You will note that it is composed of one Negro and one Japanese. I know the businessmen of Detroit are grateful for this consideration.

I should like to hear some of the comments they will make to you gentleman from Detroit when you get home next summer, if you support this vicious measure.

REGIONAL OFFICE, CHICAGO

Here is the list of the regional office in the Windy City:

Regional office, Chicago

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Henderson, Elner	Regional director.	Colored	$5,600
Gibson, Harry H. C.	Fair-practice examiner.	do	3,800
Schultz, Joy	do	White	3,800
Williams, Le Roy	do	Colored	3,200
Zeidman, Penny	Clerk-stenographer.	White	1,800
Ingram, Marguerite S.	do	Colored	1,620

You will note it is composed of four Negroes, Joy Shultz, and Penny Zeidman. I am told that a representative of this group went into the office of Swift & Co. and asked how many Negro members they had on their board of directors. The answer was, "We have no Negro members on our board of directors." Then the question came back, "Why haven't you?" This just shows what this supergovernmental set-up is driving at. They want to communize America and destroy everything which our glorious ancestors have left us and for which our boys are now fighting and dying all over the world.

REGIONAL OFFICE, ATLANTA

Here is a list of the Atlanta office:

Regional office, Atlanta

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Dodge, Witherspoon.	Regional director.	White	$4,600
Hope, John	Fair-practice examiner.	Colored	3,800
McKay, George D.	do	White	3,200
Chubb, Sally	Clerk-stenographer.	do	2,000
Ingram, Thelma	do	Colored	1,800

You will note that it consists of two Negroes and three whites; the most important post in this office, that of examiner, is held by a Negro. I wonder how the people of Georgia enjoy the domination of this group. I may have more to say about them later.

REGIONAL OFFICE, KANSAS CITY

Here is the list of the Kansas City office:

Regional office, Kansas City

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Hoglund, Roy A	Regional director.	White	$5,600
Ormabee, Eugene	Fair-practice examiner.	do	3,800
Jones, Mildred	Clerk-stenographer.	Colored	1,620
Schlien, Helene G.	do	White	1,620

You will note that this office force consists of three whites and one Negro. You can read the list of whites yourself and then judge how many of them really represent the people of that area.

ST. LOUIS REGIONAL OFFICE

Here is the list of the regional office at St. Louis:

St. Louis

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Theodore Brown	Examiner in charge.	Colored	$3,800
Morris Levine	Examiner	White	3,200
Armatha Jackson	Clerk-stenographer.	Colored	1,620

You will notice that it consists of two Negroes and Morris Levine. Just how they came to select these particular individuals to preside over the destiny of the white businessmen of the great State of Missouri I cannot understand.

REGIONAL OFFICE, DALLAS, TEX.

The members of the regional office at Dallas are as follows:

Regional office, Dallas

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Castenada, Carlos	Regional director.	White	$4,600
(Vacancy)	Fair-practice examiner.		3,200
Gutleben, Willetta	Clerk-stenographer.	White	1,800

You will note there is one vacancy. Last year that position was held by a Negro, namely, Roy V. Williams. The other two members, Carlos Castenada, the regional director, and Willetta Gutleben seem to be in charge of the office at the present time. This is the regional office that attacked the Dallas News last year for carrying an advertisement for a Negro janitor. This fellow Castenada, the director, held the same position that he holds now. If this set-up is made permanent, then I presume the rest of the white American businessmen in Texas may expect to be harassed just as the Dallas News was.

REGIONAL OFFICE, NEW ORLEANS

The regional office at New Orleans consists of the following members:

Regional office, New Orleans

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Ellinger, W. Don	Regional director.	White	$3,800
Morton, James H.	Fair-practice examiner.	Colored	3,200
Ronning, Evelyn	Clerk-stenographer.	White	1,800

You will note that there are two whites and one Negro in this office. As the Negro is the fair-practice examiner, just what the decent people of Louisiana may expect at the hands of this outfit is something to contemplate.

REGIONAL OFFICE, SAN FRANCISCO

The San Francisco office consists of the following individuals:

Regional office, San Francisco

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Kingman, Harry L.	Regional director.	White	$5,600
Rutledge, Edward	Fair-practice examiner.	do	4,600
Ross, Bernard	do	do	3,800
Seymour, Virginia	Administrative assistant.	do	2,000
Mazen, Jewel	Clerk-stenographer.	do	1,800

This is the only office we have found yet that consists entirely of white (?) people. Just what the background of each one of them is I am unable to say.

LOS ANGELES REGIONAL OFFICE

The Los Angeles regional office consists of the following:

Los Angeles

Incumbent	Title	Race	Salary
Hunt, A. Bruce	Hearings examiner.	White	$5,600
Brown, Robert E.	Fair-practice examiner	Colored	3,600
Lopez, Ignacio	do	White	3,800
Vetter, Vera G.	Clerk-stenographer.	do	1,800
Lerna, Marie	do	do	1,620

You will note that there are four whites and one Negro in this office, the Negro being the fair-practice examiner. I do not know what consideration the white businessmen of the Los Angeles area are receiving at the hands of this group, but from what I can hear there is considerable gnashing of teeth over the situation.

Mr. Chairman, this FEPC is a supergovernment of commissars, with more power for evil than any other agency that has ever been created in this country. If Congress should ratify it and make it the law of the land, then we will have sacrificed and destroyed that sacred freedom for which our brave men are now fighting and dying on every battle front in the world.

We have no right to pass such a drastic, revolutionary measure that literally changes our way of life, as well as our form of government, while these boys are away from home in uniform, fighting to sustain American institutions.

As I said before, we are going to carry this battle against such un-American activities into every congressional district in the United States next year, in the primary, so that no one can crawl behind the party cloak and claim immunity at the hands of any segment of our people.

This is a battle for the survival of free constitutional government, for the survival of the American way of life, for the survival of free enterprise, for the survival of American liberty itself.

It is a battle to save America for Americans.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUSBEY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

COMMUNIST INFILTRATION IN GOVERNMENT

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, the current discussion relative to the endorsement of Mr. David Lilienthal, Herbert Marks, Carroll L. Williams for posts on the Atomic Commission raises the entire question of the importance of checking upon the loyalty qualifications of scientific personnel and the political astuteness of such personnel in regard to possible efforts by agents of a foreign power to extract information vital to our security.

For example, I have before me a copy of Federal Science Progress for March 1947, published by the Department of Commerce, under the editorship of Mr. J. C. Green. Included in this issue is a detailed article on uranium, with formulas and elaborate charts showing the construction of uranium-manufacturing plants. I would like to know the value to the United States of making this information public. I would like to know whether the military intelligence services have checked on this information to determine whether its publication is a security risk. I would like to know whether the War Department has not on frequent occasions had considerable friction with the Department of Commerce regarding its publication of unauthorized information of security value.

Your attention is called to the significant fact that the same Mr. J. C. Green, testifying before the Senate radar subcommittee on May 8, 1946, stated that both Russia and France have been given the know-how on former secret Axis war developments, including radar, by the Department of Commerce. Neither country, he admitted, had offered to share any of its war-won secrets with the United States. I would like to know all about the record of Mr. Green, both from the Civil Service Commission and the FBI. I would like to know why he is so abnormally anxious to share information of military importance with the Soviet Union.

I understand that there is an organization known as the National Roster of Scientific and Special Personnel, which is now a part of the United States Employment Service, and is responsible for placing scientific personnel in Government agencies. For a number of years the head of the national roster was one Benjamin Wermiel, who is listed in Government files as having a definite Communist record. He was a member of the executive committee of the Washington CIO committee to reinstate Helen Miller. Helen Miller was a Labor Department employee who was ousted because of her Communist record and activities. Mr. Wermiel is also a member of record of the Washington Committee for Democratic Action, which has been active in defending Federal employees with subversive records; the Washington Book Shop, which is the headquarters for Communist literature in the city of Washington; and the American League for Peace and Democracy, cited as a Communist front by Attorney General Francis Biddle.

I should like to know what role Mr. Wermiel plays in this set-up. I should like to know whom the national roster has recommended and for what posts.

Just before taking the floor I checked to see if Mr. Benjamin Wermeil was still there, and I am informed that he is placement analyst, operations branch, National Roster of Scientific and Special Personnel, part of the United States Employment Service, room 403, Twelfth and Constitution, temporary U, and is still on the job.

Then we have Mr. John Donald Kingsley, recently appointed as executive secretary of the President's Scientific Research Board, dealing with military information of first-rate importance to this country. Mr. Kingsley is coauthor of a book entitled "Strategy for Democracy," which is a streamlined exposition of communist theory. Government files will show his record as either a communist sympathizer or an actual member of the Communist Party. Certainly he is not a person in whom full confidence could be placed for this most sensitive and strategic post.

I should like to know who has recommended these individuals and I should like to know what the Government is doing to counteract this type of infiltration. Furthermore, I here and now publicly demand an immediate and thorough investigation of the afore-mentioned individuals by the Civil Service Commission and the FBI with a view to determining their fitness for the posts they at present hold.

On January 29 most of the Members of this House were shocked at the disclosure of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] when he displayed a large book that was published in 1946 by the Amtorg Trading Corp., official agency of the Russian Government. The book might properly be referred to as a manual for the bombing and sabotaging of the United States. I think it is high time that some of us start thinking a little bit about the preservation of our own Government.

There has been a great deal of discussion of late regarding the investigation made of employees of the TVA by the Un-American Activities Committee of the House in 1940. For the record, I should like to state that the Un-American Activities Committee has at no time made an investigation of the personnel of the TVA. In 1940 the names of some 9 or 10 individuals were called to their attention, and Mr. Joe Starnes, then a Member of this House and a member of that committee, interviewed these individuals. That was the extent of that investigation.

Land knows what would be discovered if the entire personnel of the TVA had ever been investigated. I make that statement at this time because when Mr. Starnes testified on February 6, 1947, before the Committee on Atomic Energy in the Senate, newspaper accounts left the impression that the personnel of TVA had been investigated and only three Communists were found. I think it would be a good idea if the entire investigation were started all over again from top to bottom and the entire group were screened so that all the facts might be disclosed. This leads me to the conclusion, as I stated on the floor of the House the other day, that wherever there is one iota of doubt as to the loyalty of any employee of the Federal Government, that doubt should be resolved in favor of the Government. There would be nothing against a person's record if a department of the Government chose not to employ him. But under the present circumstances, as soon as a man or woman is relieved of employment in one of the various departments, he or she appeals, as happened in the Carl Marzani case who was indicted by the Department of Justice last month. Mr. Marzani was on my list in 1943 as one of the Communists I thought should be out of the Government. What did he do? He brought four of his fellow employees from the Department of State to testify as to his ability and work in that particular office. Not one of those four knew a thing about his background and past record. On the testimony of these four men working with him, the Civil Service Commission reversed the decision of ineligibility and declared him eligible. I also want to make the charge at this time that the Civil Service Commissioners have been letting the heads of departments of our Government make the decisions for them as to whether a man should be declared eligible or ineligible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUSBEY] may proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBEY. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. The gentleman referred to a Benjamin Wermiel as being in the United States Employment Service.

Mr. BUSBEY. That is right.

Mr. CHURCH. And also to a Helen Miller in the Labor Department. Will the gentleman place in the RECORD more exactly where Helen Miller is employed in the Labor Department?

Mr. BUSBEY. Helen Miller was formerly an employee of the Labor Department and since this magazine has just been published I have not had the time to check to see whether Helen Miller is still retained in the Labor Department or not. Perhaps the gentleman from Illinois has some information along that line.

Mr. CHURCH. No; the gentleman from Illinois and some of the other Members here listening to the gentleman speaking are members of the Committee on Appropriations and subcommittees thereof that are considering whether or not certain bureaus of the Labor Department shall receive additional funds and additional personnel. The information that the gentleman is giving is very valuable with respect to that subject.

Mr. BUSBEY. I might say to my colleague from Illinois, that I shall be very happy to check on the whereabouts of Helen Miller this afternoon within the next 2 hours and communicate that information to him.

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McDOWELL. Does the gentleman from Illinois know that the magazine he is discussing is for sale at 25 cents per copy at the entrance of the Department of Commerce and is available to any person who cares to buy it in any amount?

Mr. BUSBEY. These various publications by the Department of Commerce are available to anyone who wishes them, whether purchased or given to him.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Does the gentleman charge that today there are Communists in the administration of the TVA activities?

Mr. BUSBEY. I did not charge there were Communists at this present time in the TVA. I did say it would be a very healthy condition, I think, if the entire personnel were screened to ascertain if there were Communists in the TVA. I have not gone into the TVA since I have had the honor of returning to this august body.

To my knowledge Mr. David Lilienthal has never done one single thing to ascertain or prevent the infiltration of Communists in the TVA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUSBEY] has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MONRONEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter from ex-Senator Owen relating to the global alphabet.

Mr. DONOHUE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. NORMAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address by the Honorable HAL HOLMES, delivered at the annual Lincoln Day dinner in Olympia, Wash., February 12.

Mr. REED of New York asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include excerpts and letters.

MRS. NELLIE W. PHILLIPS

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include therein certain letters and extracts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I am taking this time today to tell my colleagues in Congress and the people of the United States about the patriotic and unselfish work of an outstanding American citizen. This fellow American is Mrs. Nellie W. Phillips, of Northfield, Minn. She is deserving of our praise and commendation. For nearly 5 years, during the entire World War II period, Nellie Phillips carried on a continuous flow of correspondence with nearly 800 men and women in the armed services from the Northfield community. Her cheery and news-filled letters went to all parts of the world to strengthen the morale of our fighting men on all fronts. Nellie Phillips helped win the war, and I am happy to have this opportunity to pay my tribute to her and the contribution which she has made to our country.

On January 21, 1947, the citizens of Northfield, Minn., joined in honoring Mrs. Nellie Phillips for her outstanding service to the young men and women of the Northfield community who served in the armed forces during the late war. The Eugene H. Truax Post, No. 4393, Veterans of Foreign Wars of Northfield, which organization sponsored the community tribute in honor of Mrs. Phillips, presented her with the Veterans of Foreign Wars citizenship medal. This recognition is the highest honor which is within the power of any VFW post to bestow upon any citizen.

Scores of letters were received by Mrs. Phillips from distinguished Americans—a few of which I will include as a part of my remarks—together with an account of the ceremonies in her honor. We raise our voices in tribute to Mrs. Phillips and wish her good health and every happiness for the years to come.

[From the Northfield (Minn.) News of January 3, 1947]

"MOM" NELLIE PHILLIPS RECEIVES VFW GOOD CITIZENSHIP MEDAL FOR LOVING SERVICE TO WORLD WAR II VETERANS

Hundreds of returned servicemen, friends, and fellow citizens turned out on the evening of "Mom" Phillips Day, Tuesday, January 21, to honor the woman who throughout World War II worked unsparingly to keep Northfield boys and girls serving in the armed forces in touch with each other and with their home town.

Sponsored by the Eugene H. Truax Post, No. 4393, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, the festivities included a dinner at Young's dining room, attended by World War II veterans and their wives and a few other close friends, followed by a large gathering in the Northfield High School auditorium.

With George Zanmiller, Sr., as master of ceremonies, the program got off to a zippy start with a delightful confusion of George and his son George, both of whom served in the South Pacific during World War II.

The program included music by the Northfield High School band and the madrigal singers, under the direction of Paul W. Stoughton; remarks by Arthur H. Crawford, chairman of the committee in charge; address of welcome by Mayor H. B. Kump; greetings by Frank Bernard, adjutant of American Legion Post No. 84; greetings from the Northfield Association by C. C. Heibel; an informal discussion by "Mom" and two of her boys, Erling Larsen and Courtney Cleland, over the famed coffee pot; the presentation to Mrs. Phillips of the VFW Citizenship Medal by Myron Ellingboe, commander of the post; the reading of letters of congratulation from Army, Navy, and Government dignitaries; an address by James A. Murphy, Minnesota State commander of the VFW; and before the playing of the national anthem, a tableau of the raising of the flag on Iwo Jima with a moment in silent memory for Northfield's war casualties.

During the informal coffee-pot discussion Mrs. Phillips was directed to raise the lid and draw out the transportation ticket for a vacation trip to California given her by the Eugene H. Truax Post. She was also given a check to cover the expenses of her vacation. Mr. Cleland announced that arrangements had been made for "Mom's" appearance on Art Linkletter's radio program in Hollywood.

In his address of appreciation Mr. Murphy asserted, "This action demonstrates that the hand of comradeship is not reserved just for those who shared the trial by fire, but is extended in sheer gratitude to those who served on the home front. In honoring Mrs. Phillips I like to feel that the people of Northfield are honoring all those 'who also serve who only wait.'"

Among the veterans and their wives from a distance who attended the dinner and program were Robert Dunlop, of Aberdeen, S. Dak.; William Dunlop, of Owatonna; Mr. and Mrs. William Robinson and John Lysne, of Minneapolis; Mr. and Mrs. Elmer McClintock, of Rochester.

ARMY, NAVY, CONGRESSIONAL, NATIONAL, AND STATE LEADERS SEND GREETINGS AND TRIBUTES TO "MOM" NELLIE PHILLIPS

EDWARD J. THYE, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

"DEAR MRS. PHILLIPS: It seems so very fitting to me that Northfield community and its fine group of veterans are arranging a special recognition of your splendid work that no words from any source could add to this simple and spontaneous gesture of good will and appreciation. However, as one who watched from the Governor's office the work the Northfield's beloved "Mom" did during the war years, I take pleasure in joining the many who are sending greetings and good wishes to you.

"More than any person I know you have exemplified the spirit of the folks at home toward our young men and women in the war service. Your influence has extended far beyond Northfield community, and it will be remembered long into the future. It represents far more than a devoted and patriotic effort typical of you. It is symbolic of the finer things in our common life as Americans.

"You have reason to be proud of your part in a great enterprise, and we are proud of you."

William E. Revier, commissioner, State of Minnesota Department of Veterans' Affairs, St. Paul:

"DEAR MOM: It was with genuine pleasure that I learned of the testimonial in your honor which is being sponsored by the Eugene Truax Post, Veterans of Foreign Wars.

"I know of nothing that is more deserving or appropriate than an affair such as this, where the people of the Northfield community can get together and express to you their appreciation of a job so well done.

"I am indeed sorry that it is going to be impossible for me to be present on this occasion and ask that I be permitted to use this method of expressing to you my congratulations and appreciation of a wonderful job.

"With best wishes for your continued health and happiness, I am,

"Sincerely,

"BILL."

Luther W. Youngdahl, Governor of Minnesota: "Truly, you have displayed the highest qualities of good citizenship. Your unselfish and conscientious efforts are most deserving of commendation by all citizens of our State. It was such service as yours that lifted the spirits of our young men and women and helped to carry them on to victory. It must be deeply gratifying to you to know that the real reward is the place which you will always hold in the hearts of the young people who will never forget your kindness and friendship."

AUGUST H. ANDRESEN, Congress of the United States, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

"MY DEAR MRS. PHILLIPS: I regret very much that I will not be able to be in Northfield Tuesday to join with your host of friends in honoring you for your outstanding contribution to your country during the recent war. Your untiring effort in keeping up continuous correspondence over a 5-year period with several hundred servicemen is in itself a remarkable achievement, and I am positive that the veterans of World War II who had the privilege of hearing from you will always gratefully remember their friend, Nellie Phillips.

"Although I cannot be present at the testimonial gathering in your honor, it gives me a great deal of satisfaction in extending a personal greeting from Mrs. Andresen and myself with our good wishes to you on the occasion. As your Representative in Congress, I consider you as the No. 1 American citizen in my district and in the country, and when I receive a full account of the gatherings in your honor, I will see to it that the entire country learns of the patriotic endeavors and outstanding Americanism of Mrs. Nellie Phillips, of Northfield.

"Wishing you the best of health and happiness for many years to come, and with kindest personal regards from Mrs. Andresen and myself."

Dwight D. Eisenhower, the Chief of Staff, War Department, Washington, D. C.:

"DEAR MRS. PHILLIPS: May I extend to you my sincere thanks and congratulations on the outstanding service you rendered during the war years.

"I appreciate the magnitude of your undertaking in corresponding with more than 800 Northfield men and women who were in the service of our country. Letters from the home town with news of friends and loved ones were a prime source of inspiration to fighting men in every theater of operations. The selfless task you performed was undoubtedly reflected in the devotion to duty of Northfield's sons and daughters who served with the armed forces.

"I know the citizens of Northfield, and of all Minnesota, take an intense pride in your patriotic contribution, and I join them in warm greetings and best wishes."

Robert P. Patterson, Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

"DEAR MRS. PHILLIPS: The Honorable AUGUST H. ANDRESEN has brought to my attention your splendid contribution to the morale of our servicemen during World War II.

"Mr. ANDRESEN has informed me of your frequent correspondence with some 800 men and women of our armed forces which, over a period of 5 years, brought them news and encouragement from their home community. The morale value of cheerful letters to service personnel far from home can hardly be overestimated, and it is a tribute to your understanding and unselfishness that you undertook this task which required so much of your time and effort.

"I wish to express to you, on behalf of the War Department, my sincere appreciation for the fine service you have rendered through this activity."

James F. Byrnes, the Secretary of State, Washington:

"DEAR MRS. PHILLIPS: I have been informed that your community is honoring you on January 21 for your outstanding contribution toward the maintenance of the morale of our armed forces.

"I wish to add my word to the praise which will be accorded to you. Your work, which was undertaken solely because of your love for and understanding of the men and women fighting for our country, is an outstanding example of citizenship at its best.

"Please accept my appreciation for your services to our country and my best wishes for the future."

James Forrestal, the Secretary of the Navy, Washington: "An incalculable ingredient of any successful accomplishment, as necessary in winning a war as men and machines, is morale. Your outstanding and patriotic efforts in connection with writing letters to servicemen was an invaluable morale builder, and as such made a definite contribution to our ultimate goal—victory. We, in the Navy, are sincerely grateful for your commendable contribution during the long hard years of the struggle."

William D. Leahy, Chief of Staff to the Commander in Chief, the White House, Washington, D. C.: "I have been informed by Congressman ANDRESEN of the patriotic services performed by you in maintaining, during the course of the war, correspondence with the men and women of your community serving in the armed forces of our country. Upon the occasion of the testimonial being tendered to you by your friends and neighbors, may I join with them in sincere congratulations and best wishes."

Lewis B. Hershey, major general, United States Army, Director of Selective Service: "Women have always played a most important and indispensable role in supporting fighting men whenever our Nation has needed their services. Your cheerful letters to the fighting men in all parts of the world and your support of the community program for those men who were on duty in this country built morale in these men who were so far from their own home and family. It is an honor and a privilege to join in paying well-deserved tribute to you, Mrs. Phillips, for unusual services outstandingly performed."

Omar N. Bradley, general, United States Army, Veterans' Administration, Washington: "Throughout the war our men valued more than anything else the ties that bound them to their home towns. Citizens like yourself, who devoted their time and their hearts to these men, will always be remembered for the happiness they brought, not only by the servicemen themselves but by the communities which have been enriched by their return."

Letters of greeting were also received from Joseph W. Martin, Jr., Speaker of the House of Representatives at Washington; Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg, from Michigan; Maj. Gen. Edward F. Witsell, the Adjutant General, War Department, Washington; Carl Weicht; and others.

A DESCRIPTION OF CITIZENSHIP MEDAL

The Veterans of Foreign Wars Citizenship Medal, awarded to Mrs. Nellie W. Phillips at Tuesday evening's testimonial, constitutes the highest honor which is within the power of any VFW post to bestow upon a citizen.

Honor, loyalty, courage, and leadership are considered requirements for the award. The Northfield VFW Post feels that these are important attributes of good citizenship, and that "Mom" has displayed them in every sense.

A description of the medal, which "Mom" received from Myron Ellingboe, post commander, indicates the manner in which these attributes have been symbolized.

The busts of Abraham Lincoln and George Washington were placed on the medal to represent the fundamentals of Americanism and citizenship for which the Veterans of Foreign Wars stands. The American flag symbolizes all that America means to liberty loving people—the principles of freedom and justice which have been consecrated with the blood of our armed forces.

The wreaths on the lower part of the medal represent victory and achievement, while above is the sun casting the light of understanding and knowledge.

The reverse side, with the VFW Cross of Malta emblem partly within a circle of 13 stars, represents the Original Thirteen Colonies, and recognizes the part played by America's overseas veterans in perpetuating the Nation, its ideals, and institutions.

The words "For American Citizenship" indicate the honor for which the medal is awarded, while the slogan "One Flag, One Country, One Language" denotes the broad definition of Americanism as advanced by the Veterans of Foreign Wars. "Mom" Phillips' name and the date, January 21, 1947, are engraved in the center.

The citizenship medal, as an organizational award, dates from 1935, at which time it was developed by the VFW's national department of Americanism, under the directorship of Victor Devereaux.

[From the Northfield (Minn.) Independent-News of January 21, 1947]

"MOM" IS AWARDED MEDAL BY GROUP OF "HER BOYS"

Mrs. Nellie W. Phillips, known by hundreds of servicemen far from her own home city, but more especially by the boys who saw service from the Northfield community during World War II, who affectionately call her "Mom," this evening will be recipient of the Veterans of Foreign Wars Citizenship Medal, highest honor within the power of Eugene H. Truax Post, No. 4393, to bestow upon a local citizen. Gene Truax was one of the first of Mom's boys to make the supreme sacrifice in this war, and the post is named in his honor. So it is peculiarly fitting that this post bestow upon Mom this honor, one of the first awards by the VFW in the upper Midwest.

The committee in charge: Arthur B. Crawford, chairman; E. Haines Cook; Donald Lindberg; Lyle Wing; Erling Larsen; Willard T. Nelson; Courtney Cleland; Lawrence F. Sanneman; George Zanmiller.

MAYOR'S PROCLAMATION

To the Citizens of the Northfield Community:

The Eugene H. Truax Post, No. 4393, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, of Northfield, has set Tuesday, January 21, 1947, for the purpose of honoring Mrs. Nellie W. Phillips for her outstanding service to the young men and women of the Northfield community who served in the armed forces during the late war.

This service was of such outstanding character that it has warranted the highest award that may be conferred by the Veterans of Foreign Wars upon a civilian.

In view of the fact that the young men and women in the armed forces enjoyed the splendid influence and the comfort of her unselfish service in their behalf, it merits the gratitude of all the citizens of the Northfield community, many of whom have expressed a desire to join with Eugene H. Truax Post, No. 4393, VFW, in honoring our own "Mom" Phillips;

Therefore, I, as mayor of the city of Northfield, hereby declare and proclaim Tuesday, the 21st day of January 1947, as "Mom" Phillips Day, and urge the entire Northfield community to join with the veterans in appropriate ceremonies to show honor to our distinguished citizen.

HENRY B. KUMP,
Mayor of Northfield.

JANUARY 13, 1947.

COMMUNISTS IN THE GOVERNMENT SERVICE

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, since the Eightieth Congress has convened we have been regaled on this floor by continuous attacks on communism. I do not believe any Member of this House, and certainly I can say for myself, believes in the theory of communism. Certainly any Government department that has Communists among its personnel should be examined, and those men removed from the pay roll.

We have just been having the spectacle before a certain committee in the other body, the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy Legislation, of which I happen to be a member, of an attempt to pillory David E. Lilienthal, who has been appointed as Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission. Regardless of whether you or I believe in the economic beliefs of David E. Lilienthal, I think we can all agree that there has not been one iota of proof produced to indicate that this gentleman is a Communist or has communistic leanings. Certainly the credo of faith which he expressed the other day before that committee, and which was given front-page notice in practically every metropolitan newspaper in the United States, is a democratic creed which will go down in history as one of the great utterances of an individual of real belief in a democratic philosophy, in a real religious and spiritual meaning of what democracy is.

My word of warning, if I may be allowed to make it, is that when Members of Congress rise on this floor and hurl the charge of communism at an individual, or what in my mind is still worse, imply that a certain individual is communistic without any proof; or to question the patriotism of an individual, he should have some evidence to submit to substantiate the accusation. I say that when proof is lacking, the statements are cowardly attempts to besmirch a man's honor; and it is a procedure to which, as far as I am concerned, I will not be a party. As Members of Congress we have an immunity under which we may make statements on the floor of the House that if made in public would be libelous, would carry with them the danger of our being sued for making libelous statements.

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I refuse to yield at this time.

I say that if any Member has evidence as to the disloyalty of an individual whether he be in the TVA, the Post Office, or any other Government department, it is entirely within his right to come to this Chamber, make that charge and substantiate it with what he believes to be proof. But I say that you go beyond the rights of a Member of Congress when you impute by inference or question a man's reputation, unless you have proof to lay before the American public. Because every word that is uttered in this rostrum is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and it can be used in public newspapers and prints, it can be reprinted and cause doubt regarding the character of an individual.

I certainly do not stand here to protect communism or fascism. I stand here to protect what I believe is the right of an individual to economic beliefs, political beliefs, and religious beliefs which may be different from mine, and which I may not believe in, but which I say as long as they do not subvert the real principles of American citizenship and American democracy, may be held by that individual. I stand before the bar of public opinion and preserve that right.

I now yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. BUSBEY. I wish to ask my friend from California if he thinks the statements I just made on the floor of this House come within the category of his remarks?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I will say this, with no offense to the gentleman, that I will let him be the judge of his own remarks.

Mr. BUSBEY. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from California to the fact that my remarks were very specific, that I gave evidence. I have never made any charge at any time on the floor of this House that was not backed up by evidence.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that, and I accept his explanation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

DAVID LILIENTHAL

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that David Lilienthal needs any defense. I have noted, however, the attacks that have been made in this body and in the Senate on his character, his integrity, and his loyalty as an American.

Recently in my city of New Orleans, the Catholic Church, which I believe has been the outstanding enemy of communism not only in the United States but throughout the world, presented David Lilienthal through its committee of the South, with a certificate of appreciation for his magnificent contribution to the advancement of the cause of the people everywhere, and particularly for his contribution to the advancement of the cause of the people of the South. How any committee dominated by the Catholic Church could honor a Communist or a man who had communistic sympathies or leanings is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. Speaker, it is my firm belief that the attacks made on Mr. Lilienthal are smoke screens. Actually the attacks are directed at the great Tennessee Valley Authority, which is the creature of my distinguished colleague from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], one of the great enemies of communism in this country, and the late distinguished Senator from Nebraska, Mr. Norris. Actually the attacks being made on David Lilienthal's ideas are not whether he be a Communist or not a Communist, because the mere assertion is ridiculous, but they are based on the fact that he has represented an agency that has done more to advance the South and to bring to us a new day than any institution established there in the past generation. I am proud to stand here and make this statement and I am glad to rise in defense of what the great Tennessee Valley has done for our section of the country.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Does the gentleman know that in 1945 the Progressive Farmer, one of the most widely distributed magazines of its type in the South, nominated Mr. David Lilienthal as the man of the year, the man who had contributed more to agriculture than any man in the South during that period?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I think that was a very well-deserved tribute.

Mr. Speaker, there is another point I want to make about the irresponsible calling of communism. I think the FEPC is probably the dearest child of the Communists in America. I did not hear all of the remarks of my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], on the FEPC and how it works out in practice in the great Empire State of New York, but I have read some of the reports, and they all show how impossible such a scheme is. Nevertheless, I shall be very interested in watching how my brethren on the majority side, who are so vociferous in condemning people with whom they may disagree as being Communists, will vote when the FEPC issue reaches the floor of the House of Representatives. That, Mr. Speaker, will be a real test of whether they, individually or collectively, subscribe to the communistic ideology or the communistic thinking; and I will predict now that in order to gain minority votes they will almost unanimously approve the Communist-sponsored FEPC.

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BUSBEY. May I ask the gentleman from Louisiana this question: Knowing that there were certainly some Communist nuclei within the TVA, does the gentleman know of any time or anything that Mr. David Lilienthal ever did to purge the Communists from the TVA?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I think that Mr. David Lilienthal's record speaks for itself, and I do not have to defend it. As a matter of fact, I do not know that it has ever been proven that there were Communists in the TVA. Several members of the old Dies committee specifically denied the charge only recently.

Mr. BUSBEY. For the record, I would like to say that my attack has never been upon the TVA itself.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I am glad to know that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

SENATE

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1947

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Great Architect of the Universe, whom, by the revelation of Thy Son our Lord, we may address as our Father, help us to understand what that means. As we are now united in our praying, so may we be united in our working, that, as a team, we may be doing together the will of our Father, who is not a God of any one party, of any one nation, or of any one race. Open our eyes that we may discern what God is doing, and our ears that we may hear what God is saying. And then, O God, give us all we need to take due notice and to govern ourselves accordingly. We ask these things in the strong name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. WHITE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, February 11, 1947, was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

There being no objection, the letters were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 11, 1947.

The Honorable ARTHUR VANDENBERG,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR VANDENBERG: There is enclosed herewith a communication dated January 30, 1947, addressed to you by His Excellency Dr. Juraj Slávik, Ambassador of Czechoslovakia, which the Ambassador has requested the Department of State to forward to you.

Sincerely yours,

DEAN ACHESON,
Under Secretary.

CZECHOSLOVAK EMBASSY,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1947.

The Honorable ARTHUR VANDENBERG,
President of the Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Czechoslovak National Constitutional Assembly unanimously passed a resolution inviting the United States Senate to visit the Czechoslovak Republic. The members of the Czechoslovak National Assembly would welcome such a visit and would be happy to receive and to honor a representative delegation of the United States Senate in Prague, the capital of Czechoslovakia. In adopting the resolution the members of the national assembly gratefully acknowledged that it was on the soil of the United States of America where the first two presidents of Czechoslovakia found refuge in the two World Wars and where they were so generously helped both by the Governments and the people of the United States in the struggle for the liberation of the Czechoslovak people and for the reconstitution of their independence. The members of the national assembly stressed, on this occasion, that the history of the United States and that of Czechoslovakia have thus become closely associated with one another for all future as both are filled with examples and symbols of the continued efforts toward the realization of the ideals of freedom and of human progress.

Mr. President, the national assembly hopes that it will be possible for the United States Senate to delegate a group of its Members to undertake this journey in the not distant future to see the efforts which the Czechoslovak Republic is making to repair the ravages of the war and the enemy occupation and to convince themselves that the Czechoslovak people will remain faithful to the ideals of democracy and freedom.

In transmitting this message to you, Mr. President, I would greatly appreciate it if you would bring it to the attention of the honorable Members of the United States Senate and let me know at your pleasure of the action the honorable Members of the United States Senate prefer to take.

Sincerely yours,

Dr. JURAJ SLÁVIK,
Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary.

"Senate Joint Resolution 7

"Joint resolution relative to memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States in relation to the renewal of restrictions on the availability of Federal surplus property to educational institutions

"Whereas both the instructional and plant facilities of California educational institutions are extended to a serious degree as a result of increased enrollment from veteran enrollees and a wartime increase in population; and

"Whereas normal replacements in instructional and plant facilities during the war years were and still are largely precluded by scarcities of labor, material, and high prices; and

"Whereas this critical need could be in large measure, alleviated from Army and Navy surpluses if present statutes and procedures did not restrict and limit the educational institutions in securing such property: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California (jointly), That the President and the Congress of the United States are hereby respectfully memorialized and requested to take, in consideration of the benefits which would accrue to education and to the welfare and defense of the United States, such steps as may be necessary to amend the Surplus Property Act of 1944 and the Army and Navy donation statutes so that:

"1. Supplies and other types of personal property, as well as machinery, equipment, and tools might be donated for use by authorized educational institutions.

"2. Property may be donated for maintenance and improvement of facilities of authorized educational institutions, as well as for instructional use.

"3. Property may be donated for use in elementary education, as well as for use in secondary and higher education.

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 1

"Whereas the National Budget has long been unbalanced and the debt has increased the past 14 years to very great proportions; and

"Whereas it seems that national Republican leaders have already applied themselves to the task of making plans to correct fiscal maladministration: Be it therefore

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the House concurring), That we commend national Republican leaders in advocating a program of debt and expense reduction in advance of tax reduction; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be dispatched to United States Senators CHAN GURNEY and HARLAN J. BUSHFIELD, Congressmen FRANCIS CASE and KARL E. MUNDT, and to United States Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, President pro tempore of the Senate, and Congressman JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., Speaker of the House of Representatives."

(The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Dakota identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.)

By Mr. BUSHFIELD:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Dakota; to the Committee on Public Lands:

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 2

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States of America to grant full rights of citizenship to American Indians who served in the armed forces of the United States of America in time of war

"Whereas numbers of our people who belong to the American Indian race and who served in the armed forces of the United States, have rendered signal service to our Nation; and

"Whereas by their service, their loyalty to our Nation, their fidelity to American ideals, and their devotion to duty they demonstrated their ability and fitness to take a place in the voice of our citizenry; and

"Whereas large numbers of ex-service men and women of this race of people, although justly entitled thereto, do not now enjoy the full status of American citizenship and the benefits and privileges resulting therefrom, but do now live under conditions in which their social, civil, and political activities are restrained and circumscribed by law; and

"Whereas it is the desire of this body as representatives of the people of the State of South Dakota, that these American Indians, ex-service men and women are entitled to and should be accorded a status equal to that of other citizens of our Nation and should be granted full rights and benefits of American citizenship: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of South Dakota, in its thirtieth biennial session assembled, respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States of America that suitable and appropriate legislation be enacted extending to all ex-service men and women of the American Indian race full rights and privileges of American citizenship; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be dispatched to United States Senators CHAN

GURNEY and HARLAN J. BUSHFIELD, to Congressmen FRANCIS CASE and KARL E. MUNDT, and to United States Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, President of the Senate, and to Congressman JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., Speaker of the House of Representatives."

By Mr. MILLIKIN:

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado; to the Committee on Public Lands:

"Senate Joint Memorial 2

"Whereas the United States Forest Service is, in effect and without sufficient congressional authorization, dictatorially exercising legislative and judicial functions in regard to grazing on the national forests, instead of limiting itself to the administration of the forests; and

"Whereas a general grazing reduction program of from 30 to 50 percent has been announced by forest officials, and if such program is put into effect, it will work a great hardship on and jeopardize the stability of the users of the national forests; and

"Whereas it has been called to the attention of members of this body that the Grazing Service, which is charged with the administration of other Federal grazing lands and which is functioning under a clearly defined law recently enacted by Congress, is exercising a more practical application of conservation and is giving the users a fairer adjudication of grievances and more security of tenure and general stability: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the Thirty-sixth General Assembly of the State of Colorado (the House of Representatives concurring herein), That it respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to conduct an investigation of conditions existing in connection with the administration of the national forests, to the end that legislation may be formulated which will remove existing evils and give all areas of Federal land for grazing purposes uniform, reasonable, and just treatment; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded to each of the United States Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Colorado, so as to urge their vigorous support in accomplishing the purpose of this memorial."

By Mr. O'MAHONEY:

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming; to the Committee on Finance:

"Enrolled Joint Memorial 1

"Joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States of America to consider and act upon proposed Federal legislation related to the Townsend plan, known as H. R. 16

"Whereas there is now pending, or will be pending, in the current session of the Congress of the United States of America proposed legislation embodying essential principles of the so-called Townsend plan, in which thousands of Wyoming citizens are keenly interested: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming (the Senate of such legislature concurring), That the Congress aforesaid be, and it is hereby, memorialized to promptly, diligently, and fairly consider and act upon at said session by its legislative branches as such, and not merely in committee, the proposed legislation aforesaid; and be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies hereof be promptly transmitted to the President of said United States, the President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of said Congress, United States Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, United States Senator E. V. ROBERTSON, and Representative in Congress FRANK A. BARRETT.

"Approved February 7, 1947.

"LESTER C. HUNT,
"Governor."

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"Enrolled Joint Memorial 2

"Joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States to consider and act upon legislation proposing an amendment to the Constitution limiting the tenure of the President of the United States to two terms

"Whereas prior to 1940 it was the tradition in this Republic that the President of the United States should not serve for more than two terms; and

"Whereas during the 150-year-old tradition no President of the United States prior to 1940 had in fact ever served more than two terms; and

"Whereas many citizens in this country consider that such tradition should be made permanent in our fundamental law in order to preserve the ideals and basic principles upon which our democratic Government was founded; and

"Whereas the precedent set in 1940 may lead in the future to further violations of this time-honored tradition unless restriction is written into the Constitution; and

"Whereas a number of States have already adopted resolutions requesting Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing a constitutional restriction and many other States will no doubt take similar action: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Twenty-ninth Legislature of the State of Wyoming (the Senate concurring), That we hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States of America to consider and act upon legislation proposing a constitutional amendment limiting the tenure of office for any President of the United States to two terms; and be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of this memorial be sent to the United States Senators JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY and E. V. ROBERTSON and Congressman FRANK A. BARRETT.

"Approved February 7, 1947.

"Governor."

EXPANSION OF RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota memorializing the Congress of the United States to continue its appropriation in support of the rural-electrification program, and to refrain from enacting any legislation adverse thereto.

I fully concur in this resolution, as I know of no project authorized and appropriated for by Congress that has brought greater comfort to the rural population, and has contributed more to their convenience and safety, than has rural electrification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution presented by the Senator from Minnesota will be received, appropriately referred, and, under the rule, be printed in the RECORD.

To the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to continue its appropriations in support of the rural-electrification program and to refrain from enacting any legislation adverse thereto

"Whereas the rural population of the State of Minnesota is vitally interested in the benefits and conveniences afforded by the Rural Electrification Administration; and

"Whereas there should be sufficient appropriations of the Rural Electrification Administration as approximately only 55 percent of the rural population of Minnesota is served by this program; and

"Whereas the rural population of Minnesota is anticipating the time when rural Minnesota will be 100-percent electrified; and

"Whereas rural electrification has proved a good investment to the Government by reason of the fact that it has met its obligations, both principal and interest, in advance: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States shall continue to provide funds for the expansion of rural electrification where such construction is economically feasible and likewise to refrain from passing any legislation adverse to the rural-electrification program; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Vice President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Congressman and Senator from the State of Minnesota."

RENT CONTROL—RESOLUTIONS OF RAPID CITY (S. DAK.) LANDLORDS' ASSOCIATION

Mr. BUSHFIELD. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD resolutions adopted by the Rapid City (S. Dak.) Landlords' Association, relating to rent control.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas it is the opinion of the Rapid City Landlords' Association in Rapid City that rent should be decontrolled, as presently administered, for the reason that decontrol is essential to relieve the critical rental housing situation in Rapid City; and

Whereas there are a large number of housing units in Rapid City which are off the rental market and will remain off the rental market as long as Federal control of rentals in Rapid City, as presently administered, exists; and

Whereas the withdrawal of these rental units from the market is due to the conviction of the landlords that the present administration is unfair, inequitable, and in some cases is persecuting and intimidating; and

Whereas many of the rental units are being rented at an actual financial loss to the landlord owners; and

Whereas it is the belief of the Landlords' Association of Rapid City that within a very short time after decontrol of rents in Rapid City there will be sufficient rental units that are now vacant go back onto the market as to not only relieve the rental shortage in Rapid City but to actually reduce rents in many cases. (It is the belief of the landlords of Rapid City that the decontrol of rents will have the same effect in relieving shortage and reducing rates as the recent decontrol of meat, butter, clothing, and other items and that the present deplorable shortage will continue as long as Federal control, as presently administered, exists): Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Rapid City Landlords' Association, That the City Commission of Rapid City be petitioned by this resolution to endorse the same and forward it to our Senators and Representatives in Congress and to Mr. Ivan D. Carson, Rent Administrator, Washington, D. C., to the end that decontrol of rents by the Federal Government be speedily consummated in Rapid City: Provided, That a local rent-control committee be established by appropriate resolution of the city commission, senior and junior chambers of commerce, veterans' organizations, and others in Rapid City, to supervise rents and thereby prevent unreasonable rents, and to maintain local control instead of Federal control; and be it further

Resolved, That said committee shall consist of one landlord and one tenant, to be appointed by the mayor, with the approval of the city commissfon, with additional members to be appointed, one each, by the following organizations: City commission, senior chamber of commerce, junior chamber of commerce, Veterans of Foreign Wars, American Legion, Disabled Veterans' Association, Business and Professional Women's Club, Central Labor Union, Rapid City Board of Realtors, and such other organizations as the city commission may determine; and be it further

Resolved, That said committee shall organize itself so as to effectuate the purpose of its appointment, shall maintain an office at the chamber of commerce, and shall investigate all complaints of excessive rents, which are submitted to it, and take such action as it shall deem fit, consisting of investigation, persuasion, general publicity of such cases as it shall deem unreasonable, and proceed in any other manner which it deems may be effective.

PROTEST AGAINST CERTAIN LABOR POLICIES

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference a letter I have received from George C. Hilstad, secretary-treasurer of the Traill County (N. Dak.) Electric, embodying a resolution adopted by the North Dakota Electrical Contractors' Association unalterably opposing the present labor policies of the Federal Government, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter embodying the resolution was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORTH DAKOTA ELECTRICAL CONTRACTORS ASSOCIATION,
January 27, 1947.

HON. WILLIAM LANGER,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR LANGER: At a recent meeting of the North Dakota Electrical Contractors Association held in Devils Lake a resolution regarding labor legislation was passed.

"Be it resolved by the North Dakota Electrical Contractors Association, That we are unalterably opposed to the present labor policies of the United States Government; that we question the application of the Wagner Act and labor domination in the agricultural areas; that we are opposed to the application of closed-shop policies and the wage level proposed by the Garrison Dam project; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary be instructed to communicate this resolution to our representatives in the United States Congress."

Very truly yours,

GEORGE C. HILSTAD.

PROTEST AGAINST ANTILABOR LEGISLATION

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference a letter from Thomas Sneddon, secretary of the Rock Springs Central Labor Union, Rock Springs, Wyo., enclosing a resolution adopted by the Rock Springs Central Labor Union, protesting against antilabor legislation in any form, and I ask unanimous consent that the letter and resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and resolution were referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROCK SPRINGS CENTRAL LABOR UNION,
Rock Springs, Wyo.

Greetings:

Enclosed please find copy of a resolution adopted by the Rock Springs Central Labor Union at their meeting held last week, at which time I was instructed to send copies to the Honorable Senator E. V. ROBERTSON, Hon. Senator JOSEPH O'MAHONEY, and the Honorable Representative FRANK BARRETT, of Wyoming, and also that copies be sent to every member of the Senate and House Labor Committees.

Approximately 90 percent of the working people here are in various unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and any vicious antilabor legislation would greatly affect them.

We respectfully ask you to give the most serious consideration to any antilabor legislation that may be brought before you.

Respectfully,

THOMAS SNEDDON,
Secretary.

The Rock Springs Central Labor Union is composed of the following American Federation of Labor unions: Local Union, No. 2282, United Mine Workers of America, Rock Springs, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 2174, United Mine Workers of America, Rock Springs, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 2309, United Mine Workers of America, Rock Springs, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 2516, United Mine Workers of America, Rock Springs, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 905, United Mine Workers of America, Reliance, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 7362, United Mine Workers of America, Gunn, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 3930, United Mine Workers of America, Winton, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 2328, United Mine Workers of America, Superior, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 7404, United Mine Workers of America, Quealy, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 4376, United Mine Workers of America, Dines, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 205, Meatcutters, Rock Springs, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 1170, Painters, Rock Springs, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 502, Culinary Workers, Rock Springs, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 1620, Carpenters, Rock Springs, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 143, Auto Mechanics, Rock Springs, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 125, Laundry Workers, Rock Springs, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 19, Plumbers, Rock Springs, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 884, Electricians, Rock Springs, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 408, Bartenders, Rock Springs, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 12684, Retail Clerks, Rock Springs, Wyo.; Local Union, No. 470, Musicians, Rock Springs, Wyo.

Whereas the above-named organizations have gone on record as being against any antilabor legislation in any form; and

Whereas slowly but surely labor and management are gradually ironing out their difficulties by arbitration, and have no need for Federal laws to hinder them in their negotiations; and

Whereas an era of good feeling is setting in on the industrial front, and employer and employee are showing confidence in their ability to cope with their mutual problems; and

Whereas such laws would jeopardize immediate prospects of full production, and thereby retard prosperity to the Nation; and

Whereas antilabor legislation is unconstitutional by taking away the workers' rights of free collective bargaining; Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Rock Springs Central Labor Union, of Rock Creek Springs, Wyo., composed of 21 American Federation of Labor unions, condemns any and all antilabor legislation as unfair and unconstitutional and un-American, and that a copy of this resolution be sent to Senator E. V. ROBERTSON, Senator JOSEPH O'MAHONEY, and Representative FRANK BARRETT, of the State of Wyoming, and also that copies be sent to the members of the Senate and House Labor Committees.

THOMAS SNEDDON,
JOHN WISNISKI,
STEVE LUCAS,
Resolution Committee.

RENT CONTROL

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at this point in the RECORD a letter which I have received on the subject of rent control from Hon. Robert F. Bradford, the Governor of Massachusetts.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
State House, Boston, February 11, 1947.

HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, Jr.,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: May I take the opportunity to express my grave concern at the proposals now pending in Congress to terminate rent control or transfer the program from the Federal Government to the States. It is my considered opinion that either would be a serious mistake.

The housing shortage remains critical. Vigorous action is needed to expedite the construction of many additional housing units. Through the State housing board and the emergency State housing authority, I am seeking to determine how our State government can assist more effectively in the building program. But it is all too evident that, no matter how much more can be done by State or Nation, it will be impossible to eliminate the present serious shortage within the next year. Under these circumstances, it is therefore essential that for that year at least adequate safeguards be retained to prevent exploitation of the shortage by oppressive rents and unrestricted evictions. For this reason rent control must be continued.

But the proposal to transfer rent control to the States would, in my opinion, be unsatisfactory and unwise. The problem is national in scope and, while the Federal rent control administration is open to legitimate criticism in many respects, it is the only agency now functioning. Transfer to the States would require the creation of new, large, temporary State agencies. Months would inevitably elapse before their personnel could work out effective procedures or take up the complex details of administration and enforcement already being performed by a functioning Federal agency. During that period of transition there would be real risk that the whole rent-control program would bog down in the resulting confusion. In addition, the creation and maintenance of the necessary new State agencies would impose a heavy financial burden upon the States.

While I have recommended and our legislature is now considering ways and means of setting up State machinery to be in readiness if Federal control of rents is terminated, I earnestly hope that the Congress will continue the Federal rent control administration for 1 year after its present expiration date.

In this connection may I urge you to oppose any legislation to permit a flat increase in all rents. The two problems are related. Owners of real estate, like everyone else, are seriously affected by increases in costs. However, it seems to me increases in rent, where needed, can be more fairly allowed by permitting them only where the administrative agency can be satisfied that they are necessary to avoid hardship in any given case.

If Federal rent control can be extended for another year, by the end of that period we should be well on our way toward solving many of the present difficulties contributing to the housing shortage. Until that time, for the reasons indicated, I am convinced rent control should continue without any flat increase in rents, and that the control should remain under Federal administration.

I know that you are fully aware of the serious nature of the housing problem throughout Massachusetts, and I hope that I can count upon your active support.

Sincerely yours,

ROBT. F. BRADFORD.

PROPOSED INCOME-TAX REVISION

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a letter, dated February 7, 1947, addressed to me by Glenn W. Teichmer. I should like to document the Senate's consideration of proposed income-tax revision by this letter from one of my constituents. He presents an example of the effect of an across-the-board 20-percent reduction in income-tax rates. It presents the case so well that I ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COEUR D'ALENE, IDAHO, February 7, 1947.

Senator GLEN TAYLOR,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. TAYLOR: I cannot understand how Congress can consider decreasing income taxes for persons with high incomes and still continue to collect income tax from persons who cannot afford to buy good food.

Under the $500 exemption for each individual which is in effect at the present time and which is apparently going to continue, tax is collected from persons at the expense of their personal well-being. I know of one woman in this city who has heart trouble, and any exertion causes her to faint. She is unable to work, and her only income is $600 per year. Look at the tax table on Form 1040 for the year 1946. She must pay $10 tax. This leaves her less than $50 per month for living expenses. That tax is truly blood money.

Congress apparently feels that revenue collections can safely be reduced, so they plan to reduce her tax by 20 percent and hereafter charge her only $8 per year instead of the present $10.

On the other hand, a person with $50,000 income per year now pays approximately one-half of the amount for Federal income tax, leaving a mere $25,000 to struggle along on. Since he is in such unfortunate circumstances, Congress is going to give him a 20-percent tax reduction also, which means an additional $5,000 for him to keep, when he could not possibly use the $25,000 he is allowed to retain under the present law for ordinary living expenses.

As I see it, and as I hope you and your colleagues will see it, the persons who need relief from income taxes most will be the ones to benefit least by a flat 20 percent reduction in rates.

Please put forth every effort to substitute an increase in the personal exemption for the proposed 20 percent reduction in tax rates.

Respectfully,

GLENN W. TEICHMER.

RESOLUTIONS OF CONNECTICUT FARM BUREAU FEDERATION RELATING TO FARM LABOR PROGRAM

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I received a copy of resolutions adopted by the Connecticut State Farm Bureau Federation at Hartford, Conn., setting forth what organized agriculture in Connecticut is working for. I ask unanimous consent to have these resolutions printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HERE'S WHERE YOUR STATE FARM BUREAU STANDS

These resolutions were adopted at the annual meeting of the Connecticut State Farm Bureau Federation at Hartford last month. They form the basis of the Farm Bureau's program for 1947. They represent what organized agriculture in Connecticut is working for.

"FARM LABOR PROGRAM

"We commend the Extension Service for its service to farmers in administering the farm labor program during the critical war years and since.

"Some of the achievements in Connecticut during those years include:

"Over 31,000 full-time and seasonal placements per year.

"A definite improvement in living and working conditions on many farms.

"A definite development and promotion of labor-saving methods.

"Greater cooperation between farmers in sharing labor and equipment.

"The development and promotion of a farm safety program, including transportation of workers.

"The shortage of farm labor remains severe and all indications point to as great or greater need for this program in 1947.

"Therefore, we recommend that this program be continued under the present Public Law 229 as amended, with the following suggestions:

" 'The continuance of a national farm labor program should be a part of and directed by the United States Department of Agriculture. At the Federal level its over-all operation should be under the Agricultural Extension Service.'

"The present labor branch should be retained to direct the foreign-labor program as long as there is need for these workers. This should be in cooperation with the Extension Service the same as at present.

"At the State level there should be a farm labor committee of principal users of farm labor, appointed by the farmers, to act as an advisory group to the Extension Service in carrying out their responsibilities. The Extension Service may enter into agreements with other public and private agencies and individuals, and utilize their facilities in carrying out their duties.

"Federal funds appropriated for such a program should be limited to interstate and intrastate recruiting of workers and their families, placement of such workers, gathering and disseminating of statistical information on labor supplies, but in no event should any part of such funds be used for setting wages, or enforcing collective bargaining or union membership.

"The Agricultural Extension Service and/or labor branch should continue the operation of the present farm-labor supply centers with specific time limitations governing their operation, and provided conditions are established for local boards of trustees to determine local policy of each camp for lease and eventual sale of such centers to growers, grower groups, State or local agencies.

"Authority should be granted for the importation, transportation, and such other matters as may be required under treaties providing for importation of foreign workers in the event there is a shortage of domestic farm labor of a type not otherwise available.

"We urge our directors to take appropriate steps to acquaint Connecticut's representatives in Congress of our position in this regard."

PROTECTION OF FARM ECONOMY

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have received a copy of an editorial printed by the Bisbee (Ariz.) Review on the subject of protection to the farmers in the change from a war economy to a peace economy, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARM OUTPUT SURPLUS

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER, of Kansas, who by the seniority rule is * * * chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, can be depended on to weigh all farm bills with the interest of the farmer uppermost in mind. For this reason, his statement on how best to protect the farmer in the transition from a war economy to a peace economy commands attention.

Senator CAPPER will hold to the Federal promise to keep the price of farm commodities at 90 percent of parity for the two years following the war. That is an obligation which the people assumed to encourage farmers to produce all they could during the war years.

But, as Senator CAPPER points out, the taxpayer has a voice in the extent to which the Government should keep the price of farm products up. If the price assurance thus given results in huge surpluses, some of which may have to be unloaded abroad at a heavy loss, the taxpayer will object. Also, if the American price is kept so high that foreign farm products can be imported at a much lower price, the American consumer will have reason to protest.

Obviously, the American market must be kept for the American farmer. Some surplus above the demands of the American market is inevitable. But it may be necessary to limit the surplus if it becomes too large. That would involve production controls, which offend the American system of free enterprise. Orderly transition to a healthy peacetime farm economy may not be smooth.

DAYLIGHT-SAVING TIME

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have received a letter from Milton E. Kettler, chairman, daylight-saving-time committee for the Junior Board of Commerce of Washington, D. C., urging the adoption of permanent daylight-saving time during the summer months for the District of Columbia and the adjacent counties in Maryland and Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to have the letter printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE JUNIOR BOARD OF COMMERCE,

Washington, D. C., February 10, 1947.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,

Senate Office Building.

DEAR SIR: The Junior Board of Commerce of Washington, D. C., is sponsoring a campaign for the adoption of permanent daylight-saving time during the summer months for the District of Columbia and the adjacent counties in Maryland and Virginia. The junior board has formed a special committee, the daylight-saving-time committee, and assigned it the task of organizing a movement in the Washington area, which will culminate in the passage of appropriate legislation authorizing summer daylight-saving time.

The committee takes this opportunity to inform you on some of the results obtained by this program. More than 100 letters were addressed to civic, fraternal, and social organizations in and around Washington, asking them to consider this matter and forward us copies of resolutions, either endorsing the program or opposing it. To date, we have heard from over 50 percent of the organizations solicited, 47 of them endorsed the program and 9 of them opposed it. Many organizations, such as the Washington Board of Trade, the District of Columbia Recreation Board, the Board of Education, the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association, and 26 citizens' associations, have pledged their support to this movement and more are doing so daily.

It appears from the results so far received that the people in the Washington area, by a great majority, want daylight-saving time. We ask you to give this matter a prominent place on your calendar and request all possible support when the bills, already introduced in the House of Representatives and the Senate, are brought up for consideration.

We thank you for your cooperation in this matter. We are prepared to present the results of the campaign of our daylight-saving-time committee to your committee at your convenience.

Sincerely yours,

MILTON E. KETTLER,
Chairman, Daylight Saving Time Committee.

The bill (S. 590) relating to maximum rents on housing accommodations, introduced by Mr. BUCK, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

LEGAL ADVICE BY DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE TO CERTAIN GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to consolidate in the Department of Justice the functions of employees in other agencies occupying positions, the incumbents of which are required to be lawyers. I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with an explanatory statement I have prepared, be printed in full in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill introduced by the Senator from North Dakota will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the bill, together with the statement, will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 605) to consolidate in the Department of Justice the function of furnishing legal advice to Government agencies, introduced by Mr. LANGER, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all personnel employed by each of the agencies of the Government (other than the Department of Justice) in positions of attorneys or in any other positions requiring the services of persons learned in the law, are hereby transferred from such agencies to the Department of Justice.

SEC. 2. After the effective date of this act, no agency of the Government (other than the Department of Justice) shall employ any person in any such position.

SEC. 3. Any personnel transferred under the provisions of the first section of this act in excess of the numbers required by the Attorney General in the exercise of his functions shall be separated from the service, or transferred to positions not requiring the services of persons learned in the law.

SEC. 4. Whenever, after the effective date of this act, any agency of the Government is in need of legal counsel or advice, the head of such agency shall request the Attorney General to furnish such counsel or advice. The Attorney General shall consider any such request and if the subject matter upon which legal counsel or advice is sought is one upon which it is appropriate to furnish such counsel or advice, he shall provide for furnishing such counsel or advice to such agency. For the purpose of enabling the Attorney General to carry out the provisions of this section efficiently, he is authorized temporarily to assign personnel of the Department of Justice to other agencies of the Government and to establish in the Department of Justice such bureaus, offices, sections, or divisions as he may deem necessary. Any personnel so assigned by the Attorney General to any agency of the Government shall, while so assigned, remain subject to the general supervision of the Attorney General and shall be subject to the supervision of the head of the agency to which assigned only to the extent specified by the Attorney General.

SEC. 5. The President is authorized—

(1) to make such provision for the transfer or other disposition of Government records and property (including office equipment) as he may deem appropriate in view of the transfer of personnel provided for by the first section of this act; and

(2) to make such provision for the transfer or impounding in the Treasury of the unexpended balances of appropriations available for the carrying out of the functions heretofore performed by such personnel as he may deem appropriate.

SEC. 6. (a) When used in this act, the term "agency of the Government" means any executive department, commission, independent establishment, corporation owned or controlled by the United States, board, bureau, division, service, office, authority, or administration, in the executive branch of the Government.

(b) This act shall become effective on the sixtieth day after the date of its enactment.

The statement presented by Mr. LANGER is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR LANGER

Section 361 of the Revised Statutes, which was derived from the act of June 22, 1870, provided that all services requiring the skill of persons learned in the law and necessary to enable other departments of the Government to carry out their functions should be performed by officers of the Department of Justice, under the direction of the Attorney General.

This section reads as follows:

"SEC. 361. The officers of the Department of Justice, under the direction of the Attorney General, shall give all opinions and render all services requiring the skill of persons learned in the law necessary to enable the President and heads of departments, and the heads of bureaus and other officers in the departments, to discharge their respective duties; and shall, on behalf of the United States, procure the proper evidence for, and conduct, prosecute, or defend all suits and proceedings in the Supreme Court and in the Court of Claims, in which the United States, or any officer thereof, as such officer, is a party or may be interested; and no fees shall be allowed or paid to any other attorney or counselor at law for any service herein required of the officers of the Department of Justice, except in the cases provided by section 363."

The provisions referred to in the first paragraph have been superseded to a great extent by subsequent statutes imposing legal functions upon other agencies of the Government and authorizing the employment of personnel necessary to carry out such functions.

The attached bill would transfer to the Department of Justice all employees in other agencies occupying positions the incumbents of which are required to be lawyers. After such transfer such other agencies would be prohibited from filling such positions, and would be compelled to call upon the Attorney General for such legal assistance as might be required.

The Attorney General would be permitted to assign members of his staff temporarily to other agencies but would retain the control and supervision of attorneys so assigned.

The bill would take effect 60 days after the date of its enactment.

INCORPORATION OF AMVETS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. MCFARLAND], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY], the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MARTIN], the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], and myself, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to incorporate the AMVETS—American Veterans of World War II.

This is a companion measure to House bill 1888 in the House of Representatives.

The bill (S. 607) to incorporate the AMVETS—American Veterans of World War II—introduced by Mr. WILEY (for himself, Mr. MCFARLAND, Mr. MCCARRAN, Mr. KNOWLAND, Mr. BRICKER, Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, Mr. MAYBANK, Mr. KILGORE, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. COOPER, Mr. LANGER, Mr. FERGUSON, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MARTIN, and Mr. CAIN), was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN WAR EXCISE-TAX RATES—AMENDMENTS

Mr. LANGER (for himself and Mr. YOUNG) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (H. R. 1030) to continue in effect certain war excise-tax rates, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. WILEY (for himself, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, Mr. WHERRY, Mr. THYE, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. MALONE, and Mr. WATKINS) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (H. R. 1030) to continue in effect certain war excise-tax rates, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CONSOLIDATION OF GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILLS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, simplification of appropriation bills is one of the most-needed reforms in the movement toward retrenchment in governmental expenditures. This is especially true in the present session when Congress is undertaking to reduce the executive budget. At the present time there are 11 regular appropriation bills, each being presented to the House and the Senate at different times, and the 11 do not include supplemental and deficiency appropriation bills.

With the termination of the war, it is vitally necessary to reduce our expenditures as a whole to a peacetime level, plus the new obligations that rest upon our Government due to the war, such as increased cost of the veterans, the increase in interest on the public debt, a stronger and better national defense, and to take care of our international commitments.

The complications in the present methods of appropriating money are so confusing as to make it most difficult to understand clearly the amount of money that is being appropriated for expenditure during any one fiscal year. An example of this is given in the pending budget recommended by the President. This budget recommends an expenditure in the next current year of $37,500,000,000, although, in fact, the actual appropriation budget for the next fiscal year is $32,300,000,000, and out of this appropriation only the sum of $28,600,000,000 is to be expended in the next fiscal year.

So as to simplify and enable a clearer understanding of the appropriation bills, the Senator from Nebraska and I are submitting a concurrent resolution providing for the submission to Congress of one appropriation bill to be considered at one time. This would enable the presentation to the respective Houses of Congress of a consolidated appropriation bill for their consideration. It would give the Congress and the country an opportunity to see the budget picture as a whole and to compare the spending proposals with the revenue estimates. This is not possible under the present system of considering separate appropriation bills over a period ranging up to 6 months.

The concurrent resolution provides for showing in tabular form within the consolidated bill, not only the current appropriation items, but also the expenditures against them, along with expenditures from appropriations made in prior years, and it provides for showing, also, that part of current appropriations to be carried over for expenditure in subsequent years. This provision would apply also to deficiency and supplemental appropriation bills and would conform with the intent of the Legislative Reorganization Act, insofar as it shows the budget in terms of expenditures, as well as in terms of appropriations.

In tabular form the appropriation bills would then show not only the appropriation and expenditure figures for each item, but it would show also the totals which could be compared with the legislative limitations as provided in the reorganization bill.

The concurrent resolution provides also that each amendment to the appropriation bill shall show in tabular form the changes in each amount amended, including the totals, and thus act as a constant deterrent to exceeding the expenditure limit set by the joint resolution required under section 138 of the Legislative Reorganization Act.

One appropriation bill would have the great value of focusing the attention of Congress and the taxpayers upon the expenditures and receipts. In this period of retrenchment I think such a plan is essential. Under this plan due notice would, of course, be given by the chairmen of the respective appropriation committees that a consolidated budget would be considered on a certain day, and the necessary time could be devoted by Members of Congress to the consideration of this most vital question, with the result, I am certain, of an increased interest for economy and efficiency. At the same time the people of the country could be better informed as to the total of the expenditures proposed.

I submit a more detailed explanation of the effect of the proposed legislation, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXPLANATION OF CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

1. It provides for the consolidation of all the 11 separate general appropriation bills into one complete budget bill for consideration as a whole, at one time, by the respective Houses of Congress.

2. It provides for a tabular presentation of budget items which would show at a glance:

(a) Itemized objects of each appropriation.

(b) Total amounts appropriated by item.

(c) The amount of the appropriation which may be expended in the ensuing fiscal year, by item.

(d) Additional funds from appropriations made in prior years which are available for expenditure for each item in the ensuing year.

(e) The total amount from all appropriations available for expenditure in the ensuing year.

(f) The amount of the current appropriation which would not be expended in the ensuing year, but would be carried over for expenditure in one or more subsequent years.

3. It provides also that the figures in each of the above categories shall be totaled, and that each amendment to the bill shall amend each item and figure affected, including the totals.

ESTABLISHES RULES

This legislative presentation of the budget bill and the procedure just outlined would be accomplished under terms of the resolution by amendment of section 138 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 to establish rules for the purpose in the respective Houses.

DISTURBS NEITHER SUBCOMMITTEES NOR METHOD OF HANDLING BILL ON THE FLOOR

The proposal need not disturb the present system of subcommittee consideration of budget legislation, for it may be presumed that the consolidated bill would be organized and drawn under titles closely paralleling the subjects of the present 11 bills. It would require that all of the titles, or parts, be consolidated by the full Appropriations Committees of the respective Houses, which would bring the bill to the floor as a complete consolidated bill, and for consideration as such.

Neither would the proposal necessarily preclude the handling of the bill on the floor by the various subcommittee chairmen who conducted the hearings on the various titles under the jurisdiction of their respective subcommittees.

TIME ARGUMENT

It may be contended that consideration of the consolidated bill on the floors of the respective Houses will be time consuming, and that bringing the bill to the floors will be delayed pending completion of hearings on all the titles.

In the first place, the longer the bill can be held back without impairing full consideration, the more requirements for supplemental appropriation bills to furnish money for current legislation will be reduced. This should reduce the time spent by the committees and subcommittees in considering additional bills.

In the second place it is doubtful whether the time required for consideration of one bill on the floors will be greater than the cumulated time consumed in consideration of 11 bills.

In the third place there is little before the Congress which merits more time than the expenditure of thirty to forty billion dollars of public money. Moreover, the budget implements not only all our domestic policies but also our foreign relations, and it deals directly with every Federal operation as well as those of most States and many localities. No amount of time given to consideration of the budget is too much.

ADVANTAGES OF A CONSOLIDATED BILL

1. It brings together in one place at one time the expenditure and appropriation program of the Federal Government, so that all of the items can be weighted and considered in their relative importance one to another. This is impossible under the present system, under which appropriation and spending legislation is considered at 11 different times, in 11 separate and almost unrelated bills which are brought in over a period of up to 6 months.

2. It gives the Congress and the country a chance to see the whole fiscal program of the Federal Government at one time. Moreover, it gives the Appropriations Committees a chance to see the same thing.

3. It gives the Appropriations Committees, the members of the Revenue Committees, the Congress, and the country a chance to see how the spending program compares with the tax program, and this is in the spirit of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946.

ADVANTAGES OF THE TABULAR FORM

1. It enables all interested to see the difference between appropriations and expenditures, and this is necessary under the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946.

2. It gives a clear indication as to the extent to which the Government is committed to long-range spending projects.

3. By amending the totals it gives the Congress definite knowledge as to the effect of each amendment.

4. It provides a constant safeguard—even during actual consideration—against exceeding the expenditure ceilings.

IN CONCLUSION

Together, the consolidated bill, in the proposed tabular form, gives a clear, concise, current presentation not only of the appropriations being made, and the expenditures to be made, but also a running account of the approach to the spending ceiling.

Mr. BYRD. Now Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] and myself, I submit for appropriate reference the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the joint rule of the Senate and of the House of Representatives contained in section 138 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) (1) Commencing with the Eightieth Congress, all general appropriations for each fiscal year shall be consolidated in one general appropriation bill to be known as the Consolidated General Appropriation Act of —— (the blank to be filled in with the calendar year in which the fiscal year for which such appropriations are being made ends). As used in this paragraph the term 'general appropriations' shall not include deficiency or supplemental appropriations.

"(2) The consolidated general appropriation bill, and each deficiency or supplemental general appropriation bill, shall show in tabular form by items and totals (A) each item of appropriation, (B) the amount to be expended in the ensuing fiscal year from such appropriation, (C) the amount to be expended in the ensuing fiscal year from all other appropriations made in prior years for the same purpose as the item of appropriation referred to in clause (A) is made, (D) the total amount to be expended in the ensuing fiscal year from such appropriations, and (E) that part of the item of appropriation referred to in clause (A) which will be available for expenditure subsequent to the close of the ensuing fiscal year.

"(3) Amendments to any general appropriation bill which would have the effect of changing any figures required to be shown by paragraph 2 of this subsection, shall contain a provision changing such figures to conform to the proposed amendment.

"(4) No general appropriation bill and no amendment thereto shall be received or considered in either House unless it conforms with this rule."

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 6) submitted by Mr. BYRD (for himself and Mr. BUTLER) was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

INVESTIGATION OF MONOPOLIES AND MONOPOLISTIC PRACTICES

Mr. MORSE (for himself, Mr. AIKEN, Mr. LANGER, Mr. YOUNG, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. TAYLOR, and Mr. KILGORE) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 82), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or a duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to—

(a) make a full and complete study and investigation of the extent of monopoly and monopolistic practices in industry, trade, and agriculture, the effect of monopoly and monopolistic practices upon employment, production, and purchasing power and the effectiveness of present Federal functions with respect to preventing, eliminating, or controlling monopoly and monopolistic practices, and the need for such improved Federal functions as may be necessary (1) to develop a consistent and coordinated antimonopoly program; (2) to foster competitive private enterprise, prevent the development of monopoly and monopolistic practices, and, where such development has taken place, to work toward the elimination of monopoly and monopolistic practices; and (3) to protect the public interest through effective methods of public control of monopoly and monopolistic practices; and

(b) report to the Senate, from time to time, the results of its studies and investigations under this resolution, together with such proposed legislation and other recommendations as it may deem desirable.

For the purpose of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods, to employ such technical, clerical, and other assistance, to require by subpena, or otherwise, the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents, to make such investigations, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to incur such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which

ORDER DISPENSING WITH CALL OF THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. IVES in the chair). Morning business is now closed. The calendar under rule VIII is in order.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the call of the calendar may be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENT BY HERBERT BAYARD SWOPE ON PRESS REPRESENTATION AT MOSCOW CONFERENCE

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, a few days ago, on February 11, Mr. Herbert Bayard Swope, chairman of the Overseas News Agency, made a very strong and forceful statement concerning the representatives of the press attending the Moscow Conference. The subject is of such tremendous interest to all the press of the country and to all the people as well, and the statement so trenchant, that I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, February 11.—If the Soviet Union is unable to provide facilities for more than 15 to 20 American news and radio men and photographers at the meeting next month at Moscow of the Council of Foreign Ministers, the site of that all-important gathering should be changed, Herbert Bayard Swope, former United States associate representative on the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission, advised in a statement issued by him today.

Mr. Swope added that the United States "ought to decline the invitation (to Moscow, where the final German treaty is to be drafted), if the penalty for our acceptance of the Soviet Government's invitation is the rigid restriction of the number of press and radio men permitted to enter Moscow to report the historic Conference to the American people."

Secretary of State George C. Marshall said Friday last that he had been informed by the Soviet Union that, instead of accommodating the 73 American correspondents who have applied for Soviet visas to attend the meeting, facilities would be available for no more than 15 or 20.

Last December, during the meetings here of the Council, Foreign Minister V. M. Molotov promised then Secretary of State James F. Byrnes that American correspondents would be given every facility for reporting the momentous conference, opening in the Soviet capital March 10.

The statement by Mr. Swope, who is chairman of the Overseas News Agency, reads as follows:

"Secretary Marshall has informed the American people that the Government of the U. S. S. R. has found it necessary to restrict to 15 or 20 the number of American news and radio men and photographers to be admitted into the Soviet Union to report the Moscow meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers. There was no restriction on the number of correspondents covering previous sessions of the Council in Paris and New York. More than 500 correspondents are accredited to the United Nations here of whom 300 are Americans.

"The forthcoming meeting in Moscow is the most important of any of the meetings of the foreign ministers yet held for it will consider the question of the terms under which Germany and Austria must live, for years to come. It will in large part determine the shape of things in Europe—and to a great extent, the whole world structure—for a long time.

"The decisions to be taken in Moscow will—insofar as the United States is concerned—have to be ratified or rejected by American public opinion. That opinion will be formed on the basis of the information our newspapers, radio and magazines present to their audiences. On this, the gravest decision the United States has been called upon to make since the cessation of active warfare, the American people must have the widest possible sources of factual information and interpretation.

"There is no need to doubt the legitimacy of the Russian claim that Moscow cannot accommodate or give working facilities to all those who should cover the Conference. The answer, however, is not to restrict the number of reporters admitted. The answer is to change the meeting place of the Conference.

"Diplomatic courtesy is a civilized and necessary attribute of international relations. It cannot be made the excuse for a series of restrictions that hold grave danger to the peace of the world. Believing in the freedom of the press, we should resolutely oppose all efforts to restrict that freedom.

"The American press and radio have been conscious of the Soviet Union's difficulties in the matter of press facilities and have shown their awareness by limiting to a total of 73 the number of their visa applications. I suggest that the Secretary of State make clear to the Soviet Government the American position with regard to the press."

FINAL PAYMENT FOR TIETON IRRIGATION PROJECT, WASHINGTON

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, the editorial I have in my hand, which comes from the Yakima Republic, whose publisher is Mr. Ted Robertson, and whose editor is Mr. Robert Lucas, relates a story of an achievement which every Senator will find worthy of his interest and concern.

This story began in 1905, 42 years ago, when the Federal Government authorized the construction of the Yakima reclamation project, of which the Tieton irrigation district was a part.

Approximately $3,500,000 of construction cost went into the Tieton irrigation district. Water was first delivered in 1910 over an area of 25,000 acres. This land had been an expanse of sagebrush and desert. Today there is no land anywhere more fruitful or productive.

Over the years more than $160,000,000 of crops have been returned from a reclamation construction cost of $3,500,000.

Today marks the end of the long repayment road for the farmers of the Tieton irrigation district. Today those farmers are happily making the last payment on a Federal obligation incurred 42 years ago. When the Interior Department accepts today in Yakima a final-payment check in the sum of $19,631, it not only importantly means that the farmers of the Tieton irrigation district have paid all their construction bills but it marks the fact that the Tieton irrigation district is the first irrigation district in America to discharge entirely its indebtedness to the United States under the reclamation law.

The people of the Yakima Valley in eastern Washington State are proud of their achievement. All others in Washington State reflect that pride. I think, too, that all Americans who are conscious of the achievement will think it worthy of more than passing approval and applause. In paying their bills, the farmers of the Yakima Valley have established a healthy and proper relationship with their Federal Government. They needed financial assistance, and they got it. But in paying their debts they gave evidence through labor and hard work that they did not expect something for nothing; that they never have and never will seek either a Federal dole or a hand-out.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the Yakima Republic editorial, for it adds further substance to the statement I have made.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Forty years ago the United States Government invested $3,500,000 to build an irrigation system for 24,000 acres of land in the Yakima Valley of central Washington State.

Today, Friday, February 14, the farmers of the system, known as the Tieton division, handed Secretary of Interior Krug a check for $19,630.98. This money was the final payment to the Bureau of Reclamation. It will give some 1,300 ranchers, successors and heirs of hard-handed pioneers, the distinction of representing the first Federal irrigation project in the Nation completely to meet its construction obligation.

The glory of the occasion is not, however, in the incident of complete repayment. Though that is unique in the twilight days of Government beneficence, the glory is in the record of productive achievement by hard-working freemen.

The significance of the event is emphasized by the contributory role of Federal Government: helping men help themselves, and making it pay both ways.

During three and one-half decades these 24,000 acres produced crops valued at $160,000,000, or 44 times the Federal Government's investment in construction. Every year during that brief period the cluster of 20-acre farms blooming where sagebrush before had ruled, produced $3,800,000 worth of crops, or more than the total cost of construction.

Many of the earliest settlers were not farmers at all. They were doctors, lawyers, druggists, salesmen, hardware merchants, and school teachers who bought claims on the Tieton as a result of land promotions, particularly in the Middle West and Wisconsin. Those that stuck, those that sweat and froze it out and those that carried on from where others had failed, built value and earning power into the once-arid soil. They remained free and independent men and women—self-sufficient, honorable, and proud of their accomplishment—though the Government itself advanced the loan for their success.

Today the little Tieton is an emerald at the center of a great area of farm wealth in the State of Washington. Nearly a half-million acres laced with the engineered waters of many streams, lay as a living mosaic of a rich and abundant civilization transplanted in wasteland. This is the testimonial to the wisdom of sound Government policy honestly conceived as a service to the people, honorably prosecuted upon principles of investment and obligation of contract, carefully insured against the normal concomitants of governmental paternalism—for too often the unshakable shadow of Government aid stifles enterprise.

The abundant extent that the United States Government helped the pioneers of central Washington is found in what the pioneers of central Washington were allowed to do for themselves. To such an extent does the Central Government reach its highest form of expression. That is the meat, bone, and sinew of western dry-land reclamation. It is in tribute to the Bureau of Reclamation and to the staying power of people of strong faith that the final payment on the Tieton project has its greatest meaning.

"COMMUNIST" LABEL HELD LIBELOUS—ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, as one who hates communism in all its forms, but who believes that too frequently in America innocent persons are charged with being either Communists or Communist sympathizers, I should like to have printed in the body of the RECORD, as part of my remarks, an article entitled "'Communist' Label Held Libelous," from the Washington Post of this morning, reading in part, as follows:

The United States circuit court of appeals has ruled that in Illinois "it is libelous per se to write of a man or a corporation that they are Communists or Communist sympathizers."

Mr. President, I think that not only is sound law, but is the acceptance also of the principle of common decency and fair play.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ILLINOIS RULING—"COMMUNIST" LABEL HELD LIBELOUS

CHICAGO, February 13.—The United States circuit court of appeals has ruled that in Illinois "it is libelous per se (of itself) to write of a man or a corporation that they are Communists or Communist sympathizers."

This, the court stated yesterday, is "because the label of Communist today in the minds of many average and respectable persons places the accused beyond the pale of respectability and makes him a symbol of public hatred, contrary to the statute."

The majority ruling was by Judge Evan A. Evans, with whom Judge Otto Kerner concurred. Judge Walter C. Lindley dissented in part. He agreed with his colleagues that the term "Communist" is actionable in Illinois but that a reading of the publication in the suit before the court did not convince him that the term had been applied definitely to the parties seeking damages.

In its ruling the court of appeals reversed a district court ruling and ordered to trial a $6,000,000 libel suit against Westbrook Pegler, columnist; King Features Syndicate, and the Illinois Publishing & Printing Co., publishers of the Chicago Herald-American.

The suit was brought by A. N. Spanel and the International Latex Corp., of which Spanel is president. It alleged the company and its president were libeled in an article by Pegler printed March 15, 1945.

District Judge Elwyn R. Shaw dismissed the suit at the defense request on the ground that no cause for action had been established by Spanel and his concern. Defense counsel contended the word "Communist" had no definite meaning.

The appeals court, however, declared:

"But there can be no denial that its appearance as a characterization in a newspaper political editorial is sufficient to destroy a person's presumably good reputation with the public.

"And it seems anomalous for defendants to make such a contention (that the term is without definite meaning) because newspaper publishers generally, as molders of public opinion, have created the ogre which defendants here seek to characterize as innocuous."

CONDITIONS IN GERMANY—LETTER TO SENATOR MORSE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter which I received from the wife of an Army officer in Germany discussing in a very interesting and illuminating manner some of the problems she finds existing in Germany. I ask that the letter may be printed in the body of the RECORD, omitting the name of the writer of the letter.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 20, 1947.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
Republican Senator from Oregon,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This is my first letter to one of our lawmakers, but I was so overjoyed to read the enclosed article which appeared in last week's Stars and Stripes that I felt I must write you. It was wonderful to know that one visiting Senator to the ETO did not succumb to the VIP treatment (very important persons). It makes some of us worry when we read the glowing reports some of the other visiting Senators, newspapermen, and radio reporters give of their visits over here.

The longer one is here, the more you see and hear, the more distrustful you become of the German people. You are quite right when you say that "the German people would start another war if given a chance." To many of us it appears to be a definite organized movement among them, to stir up distrust and hatred toward the Russians. Sooner or later, every German you contact brings up the subject of the Russians, want to know how you feel about them, and offers the subtle little remark that some day Russia and the United States will be at war. They also hate the Polish guards who police the dependent communities, and try to stir up suspicion toward them.

They put their own interpretation to everything which happens. If one fired a servant for stealing, in 30 minutes' time every servant in the community knows about it, and you never know how it is accomplished. You never see them leave the house, you know they have not used the telephone, but somehow the word gets around. They steal, regardless of how generous you are with them.

Just recently a WAC lieutenant in charge of civilian personnel here at the Ninety-eighth General Hospital, directly in charge of the German employees of the hospital, was transferred to another post. Just a few hours after I heard about it, my maid told me that Lieutenant So-and-So had been sent away because she was so good to the German people. I did some checking among the other dependents in the community and found that their servants had expressed the same views. In this case, their tale was partly true, for the WAC lieutenant and her crackpot mother were forever expressing themselves about the "poor, downtrodden German people who had no part in this awful war." They criticized the Army's methods, and made themselves so obnoxious that it probably had something to do with her transfer, but she was also guilty of gross neglect of her job.

Whenever my husband plans any changes in water lines or construction of any kind he has days of difficulties until he can get it across to his key foremen that the changes are going to be made. The workmen seem to think the Army will be here only a short time, so why change things over to the American way.

The best thing which could happen to America would be to have everyone come over here and live among the Germans for 6 months or a year. There are too many people at home who have not been touched by the war, other than to become more prosperous.

I don't know whether the opinions of my Senator from Indiana coincide with yours on the German question, but I hope they do. I shall certainly give him my opinion when I get home.

Best wishes to you in all your endeavors.

Respectfully,

_____.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BUTLER ON RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS PROGRAM

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement I have prepared regarding suggestions for possible changes in the trade-agreements program.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HUGH BUTLER

Mr. President, within the last few days a number of suggestions of possible changes in the trade-agreements program have been made. Today I should like to present briefly a further suggestion which, it seems to me in all candor, could be accepted by the State Department and which would, at the same time, guarantee adequate relief to American producers who have suffered serious injury from a tariff reduction.

I say that this proposal can be accepted by the State Department in line with its repeated announcement that it has no intention of inflicting serious injury on domestic producers. At the same time, there is no reason why this change would seriously hamper negotiation of future agreements. If we are not all kidding the public, twisting words away from their real meaning to gain popular support for a slogan or a phrase that does not really describe our true aims, my proposal offers a possible basis of agreement.

In order that there may be no doubt as to exactly what I propose, I have had legal language drafted to express my thought. To date, I have seen no public proposal which attempts to define the injury which domestic producers must suffer in order to be entitled to relief. The intent of this language is to establish a standard or definition of injury. Here is the language, submitted with the thought that it may be, in substance, incorporated in the Executive order that has been suggested by others who likewise are interested in this whole problem:

"If any trade organization or industrial, mining, or agricultural group, or substantial section thereof, shall complain to the President that any article or articles are being imported into the United States in substantial quantities or increasing ratio to domestic production of any like or similar competitive domestically produced articles or under such terms or conditions as to render ineffective or seriously to endanger the maintenance of such domestic production or any wage or hour agreement entered into in pursuance of the laws of the United States or any State thereof, the President shall cause an immediate investigation to be made by the United States Tariff Commission as a preferred matter, and if, after such public notice and hearing as he shall specify, the President shall find the existence of such facts, he shall direct that the article or articles concerned shall no longer be admitted to the United States at the rate of duty specified in any reciprocal trade agreement heretofore or hereafter made, pursuant to the authority granted in section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, and the sale or offer for sale in the United States of such foreign-made article or articles at a wholesale price less than the domestic cost of production delivered in the same market with a reasonable profit shall be presumptive evidence of the serious endangerment to the maintenance of such domestic production."

It is my hope that all who are interested in this problem will take the opportunity to give careful consideration to this suggestion. In my opinion, it is the irreducible minimum that we should be willing to guarantee to domestic producers in order to give them competitive equality in domestic markets. It will not cure all the faults of the present program, but it will, I believe, strike at the primary evil.

TRIBUTE TO SUSAN B. ANTHONY

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, tomorrow, February 15, 1947, will be the one hundred and twenty-seventh anniversary of the birth of Susan B. Anthony.

In preparation for that occasion the old brick house which stands at 17 Madison Street in Rochester, N. Y., will be open this afternoon for a tea. Miss Anthony for 40 years—from 1866 to her death on March 13, 1906, lived in this home.

The Rochester Federation of Women's Clubs, which Miss Anthony organized in 1898—received articles of incorporation from the State of New York for the Susan B. Anthony Memorial, Inc. Through voluntary contributions this house was bought so that it might become a house of history—a national memorial to Miss Anthony and her associates. The woman's suffrage movement in which Miss Anthony participated has frequently been described as "the mightiest woman's crusade the world has ever known, led by as great generals as ever headed armies and finished fights for victory."

At the tea this afternoon in Miss Anthony's old Rochester home three women in costume will represent the great triumvirate: Miss Anthony, Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and Mrs. Lucretia Mott, who, as you know, are represented in marble here in the Capitol Building.

Some of the original furniture of Miss Anthony's time has been returned to the house. Other items now in this shrine are her pictures, her Bible, the silk flag used at suffrage conventions, the gavel she used when she presided, and so forth. In the museum room is the mahogany desk which was used by Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, who succeeded Miss Anthony as leader, and put through the nineteenth amendment.

At Miss Anthony's funeral Mrs. Catt in her tribute said:

> This woman for a large part of half a century was the chief inspiration, counselor, and guide of our movement. There were great women associated with her from time to time—women of wonderful intellect, of superb power, of grand character, yet she clearly was the greatest of them all, the greatest woman of our century.

To this tribute from Mrs. Catt I would like to add my own word of appreciation by repeating something I said on the floor of the Senate on a similar occasion 2 years ago:

> The month of February has furnished this Nation with the three greatest warriors for liberty in its history—George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, and Susan B. Anthony. She was truly one of these great ones. She had vision, she had courage—the courage of perseverance, than which there is no greater courage.
>
> George Washington freed this country; Abraham Lincoln freed the slaves; and Miss Anthony freed women.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR ARMED FORCES—PROPOSED REDUCTION IN PRESIDENT'S BUDGET RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. GURNEY obtained the floor.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GURNEY. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. I wish to present a matter in the nature of a personal statement which I think will require not more than 7 or 8 minutes, if the Senator from South Dakota will permit me to present it at this time.

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I think it is very important that I proceed with my address now, for the reason that a joint meeting of House and Senate committees is being held today to consider the legislative budget. A session was held this morning, and the meeting will reconvene again at 2 o'clock. Therefore, I hope I may be allowed to proceed without interruption, at least for any great length of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota will proceed.

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, the committees in joint session are performing the function assigned to them by the Reorganization Act. The purpose of the joint meeting of the committees is to enable them to report to the two Houses of Congress their suggestion respecting total appropriations and their estimate of tax receipts during the fiscal year 1948.

The subcommittee of the joint committee has made its recommendation that the President's budget be reduced by $6,000,000,000. Motions are now pending before the joint committee to reduce that suggested reduction from $6,000,000,000 to $4,500,000,000. A further amendment has been offered by me which would reduce the reduction from $6,000,000,000 to $4,150,000,000. My purpose in offering that amendment was to make such provision that our Nation could be protected by adequate forces. Furthermore, the amendment would make it mandatory that the Army and Navy take token cuts from the amount suggested in the President's budget message.

Mr. President, during the past several weeks I have made it my duty to study and analyze the War and Navy Departments' budget estimates as submitted to Congress by the President. I say "duty" advisedly, for in the troubled state of the world today it is incumbent on every Member of this body and of the House of Representatives to assure himself beyond the shadow of a doubt that adequate funds will be provided for our national security in the coming fiscal year.

I realize that in the few weeks since we have had a chance to make even a casual first study of the President's budget recommendations, only outstanding facts and general over-all consideration could be given.

It is most unfortunate and very dangerous, in my opinion, that the requirement in the Reorganization Act compels a policy decision on over-all expenditures for the 1948 fiscal year before the several committees of Congress have had adequate opportunity to go into the requests of all departments carefully and in detail. Yet serious and timely consideration is necessary at this time, and failure of the representatives of the people of the United States to assure themselves now of the adequacy of appropriations for our armed forces is an invitation to national disaster. Certainly if we do not give serious consideration now, Congress must accept responsibility for repudiating the advice of the men who have been responsible for winning the war, and are now responsible, for we have given them the job of winning for us a just and lasting peace.

Today the full committee appointed under the Reorganization Act is sitting in the Ways and Means Committee room of the House—102 Members from both bodies of Congress. This body has for its consideration the recommendation of its subcommittee which met last Tuesday and at that time voted its recommendation to the full committee sitting today that the President's budget recommendation should be reduced by $6,000,000,000. That $6,000,000,000 includes reductions for all executive branches, but primarily it includes a reduction of $1,000,000,000 in Army appropriations; $750,000,000 in Navy appropriations; and $500,000,000 in civil functions of the War Department.

In explanation of the civil-functions appropriation, let me say that $725,000,000 was recommended by the Budget Bureau for relief of starving people overseas in and around occupied areas. Also included in the civil functions is $280,000,000 or thereabout for rivers and harbors work and other public-works projects generally undertaken by the Army engineers.

Therefore, the over-all cut to the armed services because of the recommendation of the subcommittee is $2,250,000,000.

As chairman of the Armed Services Committee, I have been unable to reconcile the advice of the subcommittee with the necessity for expenditures for our own national security. I felt, therefore, that it was my duty to make an analysis of the effect of any reduction in the amount submitted in the President's budget.

After much careful study in the brief time available for such study I am convinced that the War and Navy Departments estimates were conscientiously prepared with all possible attention to considerations of economy; and that they represent the minimum amount required to enable the Army and Navy to perform missions vital to the well being of the United States. I wanted to know the effects of any such reduction in terms of naval strength in 1948; in terms of the needs of General MacArthur, in the Pacific, and Generals Clay and McNarney, in the occupied areas of Europe, and, more particularly, the effects in the critical years immediately ahead.

In the course of making this analysis I discovered that great reductions were made inside the Army and inside the Navy even before the Secretaries presented their requests to the Budget. I found also that even after these great reductions inside the Army and Navy a further cut was made at the President's request by the Bureau of the Budget, and we now have before us the final greatly reduced request, after two drastic cuts have already been made.

Now along comes the request of the subcommittee that the full Budget Committee of Congress make a further cut of more than 20 percent in the moneys allocated in the 1948 fiscal year for our own national security. Personally, I cannot see how Members of Congress could vote for such a cut if they realized, as I think they do, that in the President's budget 46 cents out of each dollar is there to pay for prior wars. In other words, if we had stayed out of World War II and those prior thereto we could now be rolling along on easy street, with a budget only half as large as it presently is, and still appropriate the eleven-odd billion dollars presently requested by the armed forces.

Do Senators think $11,000,000,000 is too much to provide now on the chance that it will save us from World War III, which, God forbid, may ever come; and do they think the retention of $2,250,000,000 for our national security is too much of an insurance premium to pay at this time? Certainly I for one am convinced that to make any such cut as is now proposed and may be adopted this afternoon in the full Budget Committee would impair the efficiency of the Army and Navy to the extent that they could not carry out the tasks which have been assigned to them, not by the Army and Navy but by the Congress of the United States, representing the whole people.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GURNEY. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator not feel that such a cut as has been proposed, and against which he is speaking, would result in the most complete unilateral disarmament of this country that was ever undertaken; and that upon the eve of a most important conference at Moscow, to which the former Chief of Staff, now Secretary of State, is about to go?

Mr. GURNEY. I thank the Senator from Wyoming. I fully agree with him, as will appear later in the statement which I have prepared.

Let us take the Navy Department first and see what we find:

Last year the Navy Department, with the President's approval, placed before the Congress a plan of operation for the fiscal year 1947 which provided for the maintenance of certain naval forces. Roughly, these forces included 662,000 Navy and Marine personnel; 1,232 ships, and 6,190 operational aircraft. The Congress, in carrying out its constitutional responsibility, approved this proposal. This force was considerably smaller than the one the Navy Department would have requested had not our national economy been so drastically hit during the war years.

In drawing up its plans for the fiscal year 1948 the Navy proposed to maintain a force of the general strength and character I have just described. A moderate program of material improvement throughout the fleet and air arm was contemplated. It was proposed to undertake a shipbuilding program comprised of a small number of auxiliaries and minor combatant prototypes. Included also was an amount representing the first increment for construction of permanent facilities to replace temporary wartime structures. Extensive plans for research and development were included. A companion Naval Reserve was provided for. These programs would have assured the naval mastery which the United States gained at great cost during World War II. They would have strengthened the hand of our diplomats at the international conference tables, and would undoubtedly contribute greatly to peace and stability in world affairs.

After these programs were first translated into dollars, weeks of exhaustive study and consultations followed involving all the responsible officers and officials of the Navy Department. The results of these studies were submitted to the Secretary of the Navy. He considered the Navy's responsibility for national security. He attempted to achieve a reasonable compromise between the requirements of national security and the known and desirable objective of true economy. As a result, before submission to the Bureau of the Budget, the original estimates were reduced 33 percent.

The revised program provided for maintaining the same force as originally contemplated, but deferring until later years some of the development, most of the material improvement, and practically all the public works. That is the kind of recommendation which the Navy Department submitted.

Now let me tell the Senate what happened next.

Extensive hearings began in the Bureau of the Budget on September 15 and continued for the following 3 months. It is my understanding that based on the strength and the modified-material program outlined, the Bureau of the Budget felt that the Navy's estimates were fundamentally sound. Nevertheless, within the confines of the Federal Budget for 1948 the Bureau of the Budget determined that no more than $3,654,000,000 could be allocated for naval purposes—and this sum included a transfer of $150,000,000 previously appropriated. This allocation was a reduction of 33 percent of the revised estimates submitted by the Secretary of the Navy. Thus we have two reductions of 33 percent each.

It is obvious that the Navy budget now before us is not the result of poorly conceived plans, carelessly evaluated. All areas of possible reduction and deferment have been so thoroughly explored that the responsibility for the effect of further curtailment must now rest squarely upon the Congress.

We must remember that the Navy and marine personnel have already been reduced 85 percent, from a wartime strength of almost 4,000,000. In comparison with this, at the close of World War I the demobilization of a force one-eighth as large took twice as long. There has been a reduction of more than 50 percent in civilian personnel, from 753,000 to approximately 360,000, and of these only about 30 percent are in the so-called white-collar group—notwithstanding the fact that in many naval activities civilians now occupy positions which could only be filled with uniformed personnel during the war.

As a part of the demobilization program, almost 4,000 shore stations and activities have been inactivated and all remaining activities have been reduced in size and scope of operations. There has been drastic curtailment of procurement. Both shipbuilding and aircraft production have been curtailed to a point where doubt exists as to the ability of important segments of these industries to survive.

Before we can operate on a normal peacetime basis the Navy must divert thousands of its personnel, both military and civilian, to the task of inactivating ships and stations. This diversion is at the expense of the operating forces, which must be accepted. Once this work is completed the diverted strength can be returned to the active fleet. During this period fleet operations are necessarily curtailed through lack of crews, and repairs are being deferred because much of the civilian force is occupied with inactivation.

I desire to emphasize that the Navy had an orderly plan for demobilization and an operating force plan which it had expected to employ until changes were justified by world conditions. As I said before, this plan was accepted and approved by the Congress for the fiscal year 1947. I am convinced that the Navy believed that the force of the size described to us would be required until conditions changed. Against this background the Navy budget for 1948 was submitted to the Bureau of the Budget.

In comparison with the force of the size approved by Congress for fiscal 1947, the budget now before us will provide for 91,000 fewer naval and Marine Corps personnel; 12 fewer combatant ships; 398 fewer supporting ships; 60 fewer operating aircraft; and an average reduction of 70,000 persons in civilian employment. The Budget also imposes a further cut in naval research and development, almost completely eliminates material improvement, and provides only a token allocation for public works. That, broadly, speaking, is what can be provided by the $3,654,000,000 appropriation.

Frankly, I feel that the Congress in discharging its responsibility for common defense should be making careful inquiry as to the wisdom of the reductions already made. Instead of pursuing this inquiry I find that there is a considerable body in the Congress who are going in the other direction. They talk about still further reductions.

On Tuesday, February 11, the Subcommittee on the Legislative Budget adopted a motion to reduce the President's expenditure estimate by $6,000,000,000. I opposed this action. My opposition was based on the knowledge that this large reduction could not be obtained without a sizable reduction in the amount allocated to the Navy and the Army.

In my search for information I tried to find out what effect a further cut of $750,000,000 would have on the strength of the Navy. I found that it is impossible on short nctice to secure any quantitative data on the effect of a reduction of this magnitude. It was clear to me that the Navy could not make a hasty evaluation on a matter which has so many implications both domestic and international. Any substantial change in the amounts available for Navy expenditure requires a comprehensive study to assure a balance between operating forces and supporting establishments.

Although the specific details are lacking, investigation discloses that further reduction in the 1948 budget estimates, as furnished to the Congress by the President, would seriously impair the effectiveness of the naval arm of national security not only during the fiscal year 1948 but also for several years to follow. A reduction in the amount of $750,000,000 would raise grave doubt as to the effectiveness of the Navy as an instrument of national policy and would thereby remove a very potent factor in the peace and stability of the world.

A further reduction of $750,000,000 from the President's budget would require reductions in the following areas, and more:

A sizable reduction of Navy and marine personnel strength would be necessary. The effect of the reduction of regular service personnel would be:

First. Immobilization of a considerable portion of the Atlantic and Pacific Fleets.

Second. Reduction in the effectiveness of the Marine Corps to support United States policy overseas and of amphibious training and development of techniques for amphibious operations.

Third. Abandonment of the material salvage program, resulting in considerable loss in logistic efficiency.

Fourth. Inability properly to administer and train the Naval Reserves.

Fifth. Further inactivation of advance and continental air and operating bases.

Sixth. Serious curtailment of essential training of pilots; air and general service ratings of all branches.

Seventh. Curtailment of educational commitments to officers transferred from Naval Reserve and enlisted categories to the regular service.

Eighth. Breaching contracts with enlisted personnel by forced separation from the service.

There must be a reduction in Naval Reserve personnel. There is in the Congress a large body of supporters of the Reserve program. Yet we cannot lose sight of the fact that Reserve training will not be effective if limited to assembling reservists in armories for school work. If they are not given an opportunity to fly or to go to sea they cannot develop effectiveness, nor will they long keep their interest. Yet with the active fleet and air squadrons drastically reduced how can we expect the men to receive proper training? The Reserves are an integral part of the Navy. Their training, to be effective, depends entirely on the Regular Navy and its operating establishment. Without facilities to accommodate Reserve training we might well question the wisdom of investing money in the Reserve program.

There would be a crippling reduction in classified civil-service personnel. The effect would be a further reduction of personnel for planning, design, research, contract termination settlement, industrial mobilization planning, and surplus property disposal which is inadequately provided for under present personnel ceilings. Backlogs of work already exist throughout the many activities of the Navy. This would lead to virtual inability to handle veterans' matters such as hospitalization information, and requests for information essential to veterans under the GI bill of rights. It would lead to the separation of many civilian employees of long service and possessing special skills peculiar and valuable to the Navy.

A similar reduction in industrial forces would be required. The effect would be a further reduction in the personnel available for repair and alterations to ships of the active fleet, inactivation of ships, overhaul of aircraft and aircraft engines, care and handling of supplies, materials, and other Government property. The cost of this property to the taxpayers was $46,000,000,000. The present force is barely adequate to prevent abnormal loss and deterioration.

I want to call attention to a tendency to compare prewar with postwar civilian employment. This thought apparently disregards the increased size of the Naval Establishment. As a matter of fact, the present ratio between naval civilian and military personnel is less than in 1939.

Not only will curtailment of programs be required in the areas just mentioned, but research and development of vital concern to all of us will be necessarily retarded; intelligence activities, so important when other factors of national security are shrinking, must be curtailed. Naval communications, including communication intelligence which played a vital role in the recent conflict, will suffer.

Now we come to the naval shore establishment. The Navy has already planned for an orderly reduction in major shore activities such as naval shipyards, air stations, ammunition depots, ordnance plants, supply depots, and hospitals. A further reduction would require a downward revision which might be adverse to the public interest because it would involve the abandonment of Government property and the weakening of logistic support of the active forces.

This brief summary outlines in a general way the basic and desperately important problems which will be created for the Navy Department by this threatened appropriation reduction.

Now let us turn our attention to the other great arm of defense—the Army, which presently has the tremendous occupation job. It is my understanding that the Army accepted a sizable cut in the over-all strength it originally presented to the President as a requirement for the fiscal year 1948. In so doing, General Eisenhower displayed a soldierly spirit of cheerful obedience to his Commander in Chief which does him credit. Even further, it appears to me that General Eisenhower took a calculated risk, in order to attempt to accomplish the Army's multitudinous missions, which only a most courageous man would assume.

THE OCCUPATION TASK

In occupied areas for which the United States has responsibility, there are approximately 125,000,000 persons whose conduct is being regulated by an Army force of not more than 350,000 men. This is a stupendous task and a grave responsibility. The imminent danger of unrest and disease resulting from the privations of war-torn countries, the hard winter now being experienced, shortages of food, and the fact that there has been little or no opportunity for rehabilitation, all complicate the Army's task of bringing to the conquered peoples domestic tranquility and a realistic concept of democracy, so that the victory of World War II may be made secure. Failure to clinch the victory will squander the efforts made by our people through 4 years of the bitterest war the world has ever known. Yet it is the immediate prospect of such failure that we must face, and face squarely, if further cuts are made in the already dangerously cut military manpower available for the task.

NONEFFECTIVES

We talk of a planned strength of 1,070,000 men. Actually, this strength is not available to the Chief of Staff in carrying out his mission. Drains of strength over which he has no control reduce this figure by possibly as much as 200,000 men. Public Law 704, Seventy-ninth Congress, provides that the Army must carry on its roll all personnel on terminal leave. In the fiscal year 1948, some 40,000 or 50,000 men will be on terminal leave at all times. There will be a large number sick in hospitals who will never return to Army duty. Many will be taking care of surplus property, and there will be thousands in various other categories not of direct value in the tasks of most immediate urgency—the occupation and the provisions of national security.

CIVILIANS OVERSEAS

There are about 190,000 civilians presently overseas, who are paid from funds appropriated for the Military Establishment. The War Department proposes to reduce this number in the fiscal year 1948 to 110,000. Surely, this indicates a full awareness on the part of the Army of the need for economy. Out of this number must come the skilled professional and administrative personnel charged with the implementation of United States political, social, and economic policies among the 125,000,000 people who populate the occupied areas. The multiplicity and complexity of problems involved in the guidance and surveillance of the governmental organizations of Germany, Japan, and Korea which deal with finance, industry, trade, labor, political structure, demilitarization, rationing and price control, information and education, restitution, reparations, and other miscellaneous phases of a national economy, indicate that, quantitatively, the number employed are capable only of directing affairs on broad policy and governmental levels.

Native labor and professional skill are being utilized to the extent that about 500,000 enemy nationals are employed by the United States Army in occupied areas and are paid with their occupied-area currencies. There is a limit to the extent to which foreign nationals can be employed in positions of trust and responsibility, while still maintaining the integrity and security of the occupation and military government organizations. I am convinced we have now reached this limit. Any further steps at this time to replace American civilians with foreign nationals in the interest of economy would be completely incompatible with the interests of national safety.

FORCES IN THE UNITED STATES

Backing up our overseas forces in their vital mission is a pitifully small force in the continental United States—a force which, in addition to its mission of supporting the occupation, must be prepared to meet any emergency anywhere, at any time. The ground combat elements of this force have been slashed to a point where they are virtually nonexistent. The service elements are strained to their utmost capacity in training the replacements, procuring and handling the supplies, and operating the ports without which our troops overseas would cease to function. So it is on the air defenses of the United States that any further reduction would have to fall. I am reliably informed that after we have provided the minimum air needs of the overseas commanders, our budget, with the slash so lightheartedly proposed, would provide for only three air groups in the continental United States. Think of it, Mr. President, three air groups for the defense of the richest and, shall I say, once the most powerful nation in the world.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

An adequate program of military research and development is vitally necessary to the national defense. To exceed an adequate program of research and development might mean unnecessary expense to the people of the United States; to fall short of an adequate program will inevitably breed disaster. The War Department's program of $235,000,000, as reflected in the estimates before you, represents, in my opinion, another calculated risk which we dare not increase. The estimates provide for a minimum of continued progress along lines of research to which we have already committed considerable money. This is sound. Abandonment of these projects prior to fruition would certainly be inconsistent with the investment already made. We could profitably devote twice as much money to research and development. It paid big dividends in World War II. It will also pay big dividends in the future.

Everyone here can well take to heart the lesson provided by the fall of France. France had what was supposed to be the world's finest army. But it was equipped with matériel which had become hopelessly obsolete in the 20 years of peace following World War I. The Wehrmacht and the Luftwaffe, equipped with the finest products which German science and industry could produce, brought about in a few short weeks the ruin of France's Army, and of France herself. Neglect of our research program will render our matériel and techniques just as hopelessly obsolete in the next 5 or 10 years.

MORALE

All of us saw the sorry state which Army morale reached shortly after VJ-day. The Army and the Congress, together—and I think the Congress can claim its fair share of the credit, by providing decent pay and initiating a program of housing—have now brought Army morale back to where it again reflects credit on a great country and a great institution. Yet, even with this housing program, there now exist permanent housing facilities for only about 200,000 men. The Army needs family quarters, bachelor quarters, and barracks. The most urgent of these needs is for family quarters, of which only 11,500 sets are now available. A total of 6,700 sets of family quarters are now under construction. Thus, the Army expects to have 18,200 sets of family quarters on July 1, 1947, leaving a possible deficit of 100,000 units. After full authorization has been obtained, the War Department intends to submit a supplemental estimate of $225,000,000 for construction. More than half this amount will be applied to the construction of about 4,500 sets of family quarters during fiscal year 1948, a very insignificant number, which cannot in fairness be denied. If we do deny them, we will not only deal a telling blow to morale, but I predict we will see a significant slump in voluntary recruiting. We have a solemn obligation to provide the American soldier with living standards befitting an American citizen.

The distribution of grades within the Army permitted by the funds in their estimate appears to me to offer fewer career opportunities than in our other services. Yet the success the Army will experience in the postwar years is also directly dependent upon the opportunities for a career which the Army can offer the youth of America. A distribution of grades offering opportunities just as attractive as in the other services is essential to the Army's success. Any further cut will result in a failure to obtain the type of soldier without which the Army will inevitably deteriorate.

CIVILIAN COMPONENTS

Our civilian components—the National Guard and Organized Reserves—made a contribution in World War II without which victory could not have been attained. In 1940, however, our allies provided the time which was essential to the mobilization and further training of our civilian components. But in any future emergency such time will not be available. The initial blow will be directed at us, and our National Guard and Organized Reserves must be prepared to take their places immediately, shoulder to shoulder with our Regular Army. The proposed cut will render them incapable of so doing. Not only would their strengths be reduced by 50 percent from the already low figures provided for in the War Department estimates, but their training would inevitably fail to reach the standard which would enable them to take their places in the Mobilization-Day Force. The president of the Reserve Officers' Association, representing that group of patriotic and responsible citizen-soldiers, has already found it necessary to bring to the attention of the President the serious consequence of failure to provide adequately for that vital component of our national security.

RATIO OF OFFICERS TO ENLISTED MEN

Criticism has been expressed in some circles concerning the number of officers in our interim Army. I am convinced, however, that the number is in no way excessive. In the first place, the highly technical duties of the Air Corps require a ratio of officers greatly in excess of that needed prior to World War II. Furthermore, the greatly expanded administrative overhead due to world-wide deployment; the occupational and military-government missions; a greatly expanded military-intelligence and military-attaché systems, including military advisory groups to China, Brazil, and the Philippines; an expanded program of research and development; requirements for the care and custody of surplus property; the settlement of claims and contracts; and a greatly expanded program for the civilian components of the Army, impose a personnel requirement upon the Army which fully justifies the need for more officers.

POSTS, CAMPS, AND STATIONS

Prior to presenting its estimates for the coming fiscal year, the War Department had been forced by considerations of economy to close many stations whose retention would be essential to rapid expansion should another emergency arise. It will have only about 450 posts, camps, and stations in the United States during fiscal year 1948, a reduction of about 1,350 from the wartime peak of 1,800. A further reduction in the number of small posts is in immediate prospect. In the matter of depots, a comprehensive plan for consolidation in the mininum number of installations has recently been placed in operation. Any further reduction in the planned number, however, such as would be brought about by the proposed additional cut, cannot fail to damage our defense potential.

RATIO OF BUDGET ESTIMATE TO MILITARY STRENGTH

The military strength of the Army is one, but not the only, important factor in measuring the cost or budget for the Military Establishment. One can so easily be misled in computing the cost of a soldier. It is deceptively simple to divide the number of man-years of military personnel into the total budget estimate, but the resulting figure does not represent the cost of a soldier. It represents only a misleading and erroneous approach to the problem. To analyze correctly the estimate in terms of cost as related to military strength, one must separate direct costs—pay, travel, subsistence, clothing, medical care, and the maintenance of quarters—from those for intelligence, research and development, mobilization planning, disposal of surplus property, and procurement of capital assets—airplanes, gliders, guns, and other equipment. The first group of costs do have a direct relationship to the strength of the Army, A comparative analysis so computed shows that pay, travel, subsistence, clothing, transportation, medical care, and maintenance of quarters cost approximately $2,800 during fiscal year 1946, and will cost approximately $3,150 during fiscal year 1947 and fiscal year 1948. This increase in costs is entirely due to increases in the pay of military personnel as authorized by the Seventy-ninth Congress and to the increase in prices which have taken place—in some cases 100 percent during the last 6 years. The costs directly related to the strength of the Army equal about 55 percent of the 1948 estimate.

The other 45 percent is for intelligence, research and development, mobilization planning, and the capital assets I have mentioned. My colleagues know as well as I do how very important and indispensable are the latter items. The weapons of today and tomorrow cost infinitely more than those of yesterday. Nevertheless, we must adequately support these costs of capital investment to provide the crucial protection which may be needed at once in the next emergency.

ARMY AIR FORCES

Let us return again to the effects of the proposed cut on the Army Air Forces. If I appear to dwell excessively on this subject, I ask Senators to bear with me, for I am convinced that today our Air Force is our first line of defense.

The estimate for the Air Corps has already been reduced by the Bureau of the Budget by approximately 30 percent—from an estimated requirement of $1,600,000,000 to $1,130,000,000, a reduction of $470,000,000. This reduced estimate will not provide the number of airplanes required to initiate effectively the modernization of a minimum peacetime Air Corps. I am informed that it was the considered opinion of the greatest airmen in the world, who, I am proud to say, can be found in the ranks of the United States Air Forces, that a minimum of 1,800 planes of the latest type should be provided. The estimate now before the Congress provides only about 900 airplanes, with necessary emphasis on bombers and jet fighters. And now a further budget cut is advanced which would halve this pitiful number of new planes.

The War Department's own estimate will not provide the minimum number of flying hours accepted as a requirement to maintain the efficiency of the Air Corps personnel. It will permit the Air Corps only to maintain and operate a substantially reduced number of aircraft and provide a minimum of training through reduced flying hours. The end product of this must be decreased safety and increased casualties. Yet certain gentlemen propose even further economies at the expense of the lives of our sons tomorrow and at the risk of the lives and liberties of us all in 5 or 10 years.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, no thinking man can question the wisdom, patriotism, and sincerity of the American who directed our Army's victory in World War II, and who now has accepted the far graver responsibility of leading our country to lasting peace. Secretary of State George Marshall, in the last few days, has warned of the danger of premature disarmament in a world in which peace is only a devout wish rather than an assured reality. Yet it is disarmament which the advocates of further reductions in the Army's budget are proposing; and it is not a planned and orderly disarmament, but a disarmament by an insidious deterioration. I use the word "insidious" advisedly, for it would be accomplished by giving the country a sense of false security—a security which could not possibly exist with the drastic cuts in our forces which would inevitably follow the reduction of two and one-fourth billion dollars which is now proposed. I am proud to state to this body that I can never be a party to such a proposal.

The United States has given practical proof of its desire to rely on law, reason, and justice to resolve international disputes. Until, however, the United Nations is a going concern, able to handle successfully the complex problems of world security, and until the United Nations has sufficient and usable power to compel the acceptance of its decisions, this Nation cannot accept disarmament. While I believe that the future holds promise of successful limitation of armaments, I believe that it is unwise and definitely untimely to effect unilateral disarmament through appropriation action.

PERSONAL STATEMENT

Mr. RUSSELL. I desire to read a statement from the column written by Joseph Alsop in today's Washington Post, in which he adverts to me. I shall not read the entire article because I am not particularly concerned with Alsop's views on other people or matters generally.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Did the Senator say "Mr. All Slop" or "Mr. Alsop"?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, it is a play on words. It is the same man, in any event. "All Slop" is good descriptio personae in this case.

I shall read only the portion of the statement that refers to me. The statement deals with the nomination of Mr. Lilienthal to be the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission. In part, it says:

> It is also significant that one of the two or three Atomic Committee members probably opposed to Lilienthal should be Senator RICHARD RUSSELL, of Georgia, which is about the only remaining State where the power people have a real grip on local politics.

Mr. President, the Washington Post seems to be very much concerned about this nomination. Last evening, when a certain William E. Gold, who is a commentator for the Post, appeared on the airways, he saw fit to repeat this statement and to embellish it somewhat. I shall read from the statement made by Mr. Gold, omitting the names of any other Senators who may have been mentioned in the context. Mr. Gold said:

> And then Alsop adds that it's significant that another opponent of Lilienthal is Senator RUSSELL, of Georgia, inasmuch as Georgia is one of the few remaining States in which the power people retain a real grip on local politics.
> The Post columnist says bitterly that, while most of the power industry has learned a great deal in the past 14 years, there is still a strong minority which thinks that "free enterprise" means freedom to behave in the manner of Samuel Insull—and communism is the public-power doctrine of the late and beloved George Norris.

Then the commentator poses the question, Why should these other Senators oppose the nomination of Mr. Lilienthal?

> "The answer," says Alsop, "is twofold. First, the activities of the power lobby, and such men as RUSSELL, who is an avowed enemy of public ownership of power plants."

Mr. President, these statements were made for the unmistakable purpose of creating the false impression that I am a tool of the private power interest, and that the people I am honored to represent here are pawns in the hands of the power interests.

Most of the men and women representing the press and radio whom I have known have been honorable people. They endeavor to discharge the high duty that falls to the fourth estate, of giving the public the facts, or legitimate conclusions drawn therefrom. There is, however, a small group of columnists and commentators who depend upon sensationalism. They have no regard whatever for the truth, if a falsehood will help them to sell their wares. In fact, it would seem that this small group engages in a continuing contest as to which can manufacture the biggest falsehood, as they eagerly vie with each other for the accolade of the world's greatest lie. Alsop and Gold are leaders of this group. They are sadists, so far as facts are concerned. When they see a fact, they are overwhelmed with a sadistic desire to distort it into a falsehood.

These false statements could not have been made through ignorance. My record in all cases where there has been a conflict between the public interest and private power groups is so clear that even a wayfaring man could read it. When I first entered the General Assembly of Georgia, at the age of 22, I happened to be assigned to the committee on constitutional amendments. One of the first measures to come before that committee was a proposal to confer on counties and cities the right of eminent domain, in order that they might own and operate their own power-generating and distribution facilities. I supported that amendment earnestly, and from that day until this I have encountered the opposition of the private power interests in every step of my career. We lost that fight at that time, but I am glad to say that since then such a provision has been written into the organic law of Georgia.

When I became a candidate for speaker of the State house of representatives I was opposed by the representatives of the power interests. They were likewise active in the camp of one of my adversaries when I was a candidate for Governor. When I offered for the Senate of the United States, one of the principal issues on which the campaign was waged was the conflict between the rights of the public and the private power interests. In that campaign I was opposed by all save one of the twenty-odd daily newspapers published in my State. I had little means of publicity, and I lacked the finances to engage radio time; I was therefore compelled to carry my fight to the people of Georgia the hard way—by word of mouth. I made more speeches in the period embraced in that campaign than had ever been made before by any man in any campaign in my State, and I doubt whether over the same period of time there has ever been any man in the United States, who, from the stump, spoke more hours than I did. In every speech I took occasion to denounce the Georgia Power Co. and the Commonwealth & Southern combine.

My opponent in that race was a national figure and a strong, able, and sincere man. But the people whom these mendacious creatures say are held in thralldom by the power interests went to the polls and elected me overwhelmingly. I carried 114 of the 159 counties of the State and received a total majority in excess of 40,000.

Mr. President, my record in the Senate on the power issue is written on the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and, thank God, it will stand there after this lying columnist and this lying radio commentator have gone to their proper reward. In this effort to lend a pretense of accuracy to the misrepresentation they referred by innuendo to the contrast between what they said was my position and that of the late Senator George W. Norris. I did not agree with Senator Norris in all matters, but it so happens that on this particular issue there is absolutely no difference in any vote that was ever cast by the late Senator from Nebraska and myself. I voted for what I conceived to be the public interest in every vote affecting electric power. I voted for the so-called misnamed but romantically called "death sentence" clause in the utility holding companies act. I have supported every measure which has been presented to the Senate for the public development or distribution of power.

Numerous Senators whom I see here today have doubtless become tired of my discourses in fighting for increased appropriations for the Rural Electrification Administration. I have been as active as I knew how to be on that battlefield since the first REA measure was introduced.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. As a member of the Appropriations Committee who has served for many years with the distinguished Senator from Georgia, I should like to give my testimony that in many cases if it had not been for his stout support of the Rural Electrification Administration that agency would not have achieved the success it has enjoyed. The Senator from Georgia has consistently been a supporter of programs to advance public power in the United States.

Mr. RUSSELL. I thank the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. I should like to add my testimony in this discussion. I was associated with the Senator from Georgia for 6 years as a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and, so far as I know, rural electrification and public power did not have a better friend in the entire Congress than they had in the Senator from Georgia. I do not know how he is going to vote on Mr. Lilienthal's nomination, but I know that if he opposes him it will be for an entirely different reason than the fact that he is doing the bidding of the power companies. I do not question the opposition of the power companies to Mr. Lilienthal, but if the Senator from Georgia votes against Mr. Lilienthal I am sure it will be for some entirely different reason, because he has always been a friend of rural electrification, of TVA, and other projects of that nature.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I am grateful for the testimony offered by the Senator from Vermont.

Instead of opposing public power in the last Congress I was coauthor of a bill to create the Savannah Valley Authority on the Savannah River in my State. That was a public power body modeled after the Tennessee Valley Authority. If in the future there is ever any hope for the establishment of such public power authorities I shall reintroduce that measure.

In the past few months I have been as active as possible in supporting Government construction of a power dam at Clarks Hill, on the Savannah River, and have opposed openly and vigorously the application for license filed by the Georgia Power Co. to construct and operate a dam on the same site, where we have finally succeeded in directing that the United States engineers shall build the dam.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I desire to add just a word at this point to say that the Senator from Georgia has been very active in the Clarks Hill development, which is now being considered. Only a few days ago we held conferences in regard to that matter. There was a fight on between the Georgia Power Co. and the Clarks Hill development, and the Senator from Georgia did not hesitate a minute to take sides and say that he thought the project ought not to be built by the power companies, because he believed it could be better built by the Clarks Hill development project. So no one, as I see it, can truthfully say that the Senator from Georgia has at any time sold out to any Georgia power company.

Mr. RUSSELL. I thank the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. President, I am at a loss to account for this deliberate, willful falsehood unless it can be attributed to the uncontrollable desire of this columnist and this commentator to win laurels in their respective fields as the greatest liars of 1947.

My relations with newspaper men and women and radio reporters have generally been cordial. I am, however, possibly somewhat peculiar in one respect. I have never believed in the practice of polling the Senate before a measure ever reaches the floor, and during the whole period I have been here I have specifically declined to participate in polls. I think it lowers the dignity of the Senate of the United States to see an article in a newspaper stating that a poll has been taken, and that 50 Senators are going to vote "yea" and 42 are going to vote "nay" on a certain proposition, before the measure or the proposition has ever been submitted to the Senate. Of course, the practice of giving out statements respecting Senators' positions is entirely proper if they feel keenly on a matter or have reached a decision on it; but, as a general rule, so far as polls are concerned, the issue should be determined in the Senate Chamber, and not in the columns of the press or on the radio.

I have refused to answer a number of inquiries as to how I shall vote on the confirmation of Mr. Lilienthal's nomination. As a member of the Committee on Atomic Energy I feel that that position partakes of the nature of a juryman, and that I should wait until the evidence is in. I realize that views differ on this question. There have been times when I have been astounded to see, within a few hours after an executive meeting of a committee of the Senate, a full statement in the newspapers as to what has occurred. I have been shocked to hear that some Members of Congress have perhaps revealed things which happened in executive session in order that they might curry favor with columnists, or with newspaper writers, or with radio commentators, and thereby receive desirable publicity. I like to receive desirable publicity as much as any other Member of Congress, I suppose, but I do not care to purchase it at that price, and I would never reveal anything that occurred in an executive session, nor will I be bludgeoned into participating in straw ballots on grave issues.

I have not responded to any poll as to how I am going to vote, but I will state here that if before the Lilienthal nomination reaches the floor of the Senate I am convinced that Mr. Lilienthal intimately associates with such individuals as the two I have mentioned, or that he has any respect for them I shall cast my vote against Mr. Lilienthal. No man who is to serve on this all-important agency of government, the Atomic Energy Commission, should be of the type who would consort with or regard highly men who are devoid of any pretense of character and without a single instinct of honor.

Now I desire to give a word of gratuitous advice to the Washington Post. In my opinion, by employing these carrion columnists and commentators, these buzzards, to vomit their putrid falsehood upon all who do not immediately rush in to say that they support them in their position, I think the Washington Post is doing Mr. Lilienthal a great disservice. He might well look at the Washington Post and say "God deliver me from my friends." There is no question that the doubts which are being generated in the minds of some Senators over this nomination are due more to the source of some of Mr. Lilienthal's support and the reckless mendacity employed by those who are supporting him, than they are to any evidence that has been submitted to the Committee on Atomic Energy.

Mr. President, such mendacious men as these may cause Members of the Senate temporary embarrassment and considerable irritation. It has been so in my case. However, I know that long after they are forgotten the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will remain. Unscrupulous members of the press and radio have an unconscionable advantage over Members of the Senate who undertake to protect themselves from the floor of the Senate. They control the means of communications and are sure of the last word. We can see, however, that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD preserves the facts, and that there is emblazoned on the pages of the RECORD a true estimate of the character—or lack of character—of those who willfully slander Senators or the people of great States. It is doubtful to me whether this consideration would cause one sunk to such depravity ever to correct an erroneous statement, or the general error of his way, because, Mr. President, such miserable characters, such charlatans of the press, such vermin as these, are like unto that animal that is without any pride of parentage or any hope of decent posterity.

THE LEGISLATIVE BUDGET

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement about the meeting this morning of the Joint Committee on the Legislative Budget—not that I intend to discuss what happened in that meeting itself, but I do desire to invite the attention of the Senate to the gravity of the issues which are involved.

MINORITY MEMBERS EXCLUDED

For the first time, this morning when I reached my office I received a copy of the report which was filed by the subcommittee and a copy of the resolution which the subcommittee proposes that the full committee adopt. I understand that the subcommittees of the four important committees on appropriations and finance of the two Houses, in preparing this report and drafting this resolution, completely excluded from their conferences members of the minority. There were no public hearings. No opportunity was extended to those who were not members of the majority on the subcommittee to have any part whatsoever in the preparation of the resolution or the consideration of the facts upon which the resolution will be presented to the Congress. Never in my experience in the Senate have I known of a procedure so completely violative of the principles upon which free legislative bodies are based. The very thought that the majority members of a subcommittee to whom the full committee had delegated only a part of the responsibility of preparing this report should undertake their consideration by excluding the members of the minority is almost beyond belief; but that, Mr. President, is what happened.

PUBLIC WILL BE DECEIVED

I hold in my hand a copy of the report and of the resolution. I say to Members of the Senate that the language of this report itself condemns the action which it is proposed to take today as a futile and foolish thing. The country is led to believe that a joint committee of the two Houses, after consideration, is about to impose a ceiling upon appropriations, and is about to name an over-all figure beyond which the budget may not go. We shall go through the form of doing so; but the language of the report itself says that it has no meaning whatsoever. The public will be deceived by the news stories which go out today after the committee has voted favorably—as I have no doubt it will—upon the proposed reduction of $6,000,000,000 from the President's budget, or a lower reduction of $4,500,000,000 from the President's budget, as proposed by the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance, or a reduction of approximately $400,000,000 more, which was proposed by the able Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY], chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, who only a few moments ago delivered a very cogent and convincing discussion upon the effect that such a reduction would have upon the armed services of the United States.

I desire to read to the Senate this language from page 8 of the resolution as presented to us in the committee this morning:

> Of course, if the accompanying resolution be adopted there is no commitment as to any reduction in specific items contained in the budget. The resolution expresses an over-all objective and its realization depends entirely upon the final action of the Congress upon budget estimates individually and collectively.

There is a clear declaration in the language of the resolution itself that the proposed reduction of the budget, the proposed ceiling upon appropriations, is merely talk without substance; that it means nothing; and that those who propose it know that it means nothing.

ABSURD AND FUTILE ACTION

Mr. President, the provision of the Legislative Reorganization Act which directed that a legislative budget be made at the beginning of each legislative session was probably a wise and thoughtful provision; but certainly there was nothing to indicate to the public of the United States that a budget reduction would be made without investigation, without thought, and without study. This joint committee has had no staff. It has had no opportunity to go into the matter. The President's budget was prepared in the Bureau of the Budget after months of study, after careful investigation and examination had been made of every department and agency of the Government. Now, to think that a joint committee of the Congress, without a staff, without hearings, could make an intelligent judgment upon the budget is simply too absurd to mention.

What should have been done is clear. The committee should have done what the Joint Committee on the Economic Report did. That committee was required to make a report by the 1st of February on the economic report of the President. It met; it considered the report; it filed its report on the 31st of January. But in that report it said that it had not created a staff; it had not had an opportunity to study the President's economic message. It said that there were items in that document which it approved, and it promised a diligent and thorough study of the question.

Was anything like that done by the Joint Committee on the Legislative Budget? Not at all.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am very glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CORDON. Does the distinguished Senator from Wyoming believe that under the law this committee would be authorized to make what might be termed a progress report? Does not the law itself require that the budget be reported by February 15 and also definitely set out what must be in the budget and what must be in the resolution which accompanies it?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The law requires, of course, that a report be made; but the obvious and practical intent of the provision was that such a report would be made as a regular practice after the machinery had been set up. The law does not require the impossible.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. CORDON. Let me say to the Senator that I am entirely in agreement with his last conclusion. It is utterly impossible for the committee to bring before the Congress any conclusion based upon the adequate study which is absolutely essential really to support a figure for a specific budget. It cannot be done.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I thank the Senator. I am very grateful to him for his statement, because I think the country should be warned with respect to the absurdity and futility of the motions through which the committee is about to go.

Mr AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. Am I correct in understanding that it is the belief of the Senator from Wyoming that the budget recommendations which are to be determined before February 15 will be meaningless in effect and without any force of law behind them, and will merely be recommended objectives?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Precisely so. They will be meaningless even as recommendations, because in preparing the recommendations the committee was unable to undertake such a study as should have been conducted.

Mr. AIKEN. The people of the country do not have such an understanding.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am doing my best to advise them. I am using the only megaphone I have; and I am very happy that the Senator has risen to question me, because the more questions that are asked the clearer the matter will become.

Mr. AIKEN. I am only sorry that they were not first advised from this side of the aisle.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. CORDON. The Senator indicated that he was in accord with the view of the Joint Budget Committee that this report is without any legal effect and is nothing but a recommendation. I should like to have the distinguished Senator's views as to his conception of the meaning of the first sentence in paragraph (b) of section 138 of the Reorganization Act, which I read:

> The report shall be accompanied by a concurrent resolution adopting such budget—

If I may interpolate, it is perfectly clear that the budget of necessity must be a set of figures of estimated receipts and estimated expenditures.

I read further:

> and fixing the maximum amount to be appropriated for expenditure in such year.

Mr. President, as I read that provision, I say, based upon what little knowledge I have of the law, that it is a mandatory provision. It requires that the budget be presented; it requires that a resolution be presented and that the resolution be a command upon the Congress until the Congress itself decides otherwise.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator has answered his own question. It is not a mandate which must be obeyed. The only mandate that can be laid upon the Congress is the mandate which is contained in the Constitution. I think the Senator will agree that if Congress passes a law today, tomorrow it may repeal it.

Mr. CORDON. Certainly I agree to that. But does not the Congress necessarily have to take some action before an act which it passes ceases to be operative?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Not at all, because in this respect the view of the parliamentary advisers of both the House and the Senate was taken before this section which I read at the beginning was inserted in the report. I will read it again. This is the view of the parliamentarians, as I understand. It was so stated upon the floor today. It certainly is my view. Let me read it:

> Of course, if the accompanying resolution be adopted there is no commitment as to any reduction in specific items contained in the budget.

If that were not true, Mr. President, the joint committee would be superseding the Appropriations Committees of both the Senate and the House; and that cannot be done under the rules which were adopted by the Senate and by the House when the Reorganization Act was passed.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further for a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CORDON. If we may assume that the law is complied with, and that a resolution is presented by the joint committee and adopted by the Congress, then is not the legal effect of that resolution that its provisions are on the same level as a rule of either House unless the rule itself be modified or other steps be taken in the regular procedure to avoid it?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I doubt it very much, because the Reorganization Act adopted certain rules which were specifically set forth as rules. Sections 138 (a) and 138 (b) were adopted, but not as a rule. If the Senator will refer to the very first section of the Reorganization Act—I do not have it before me as I am speaking—he will find that it contains a specific recognition of the power of the two Houses of Congress to change their rules.

Mr. CORDON. I do not question that. I merely ask the Senator if this provision does not occupy the same position and have the same dignity as a rule requiring some affirmative action before it ceases to be effective?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The affirmative action would be the action of the respective Appropriations Committees.

Mr. CORDON. Would such action be subject to a point of order, in the Senator's opinion?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think not. I am sure that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], who is chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, will agree with me that his committee will not be bound by the action that is taken today.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. BRIDGES. Did the Senator vote for the reorganization bill?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. He did not. He voted against the reorganization bill because he foresaw precisely this sort of difficulty arising.

Mr. BRIDGES. Did the Senator recently fight against special committees because he said they would not be in keeping with the spirit of the Reorganization Act?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do not recall that the Senator from Wyoming made any speech upon that subject.

Mr. BRIDGES. Did the Senator from Wyoming vote in that way?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Most assuredly he did; and the reason he voted the way he did was not because of anything that was contained in the Reorganization Act, but because he had come to the conclusion, from evidence that was satisfactory to him, that the purpose of setting up special committees was not to carry on any particular investigation, not to aid small business, but to create chairmanships for two Members of the Senate who were not included in the regular distribution.

Mr. BRIDGES. I had supposed that the Senator from Wyoming, like many of his colleagues, voted against special committees because he did not think they were in the spirit of the Reorganization Act.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am willing to give the Reorganization Act a trial. I am merely calling attention to the resolution which was presented, and I will ask the Senator if he does not agree that the resolution is quite correct when it says:

If the accompanying resolution be adopted there is no commitment as to any reduction in specific items contained in the budget.

Does the Senator agree with that or not?

Mr. BRIDGES. I agree that we merely set up a framework, a ceiling, within the limits of which the Appropriations Committee can function as it always has. I believe that setting up such a ceiling will have a very salutary effect on keeping down expenditures of Federal funds by way of appropriations. I think the Senator will admit that there is no department of the Federal Government today, or any bureau or division, in which there cannot be some savings made by eliminating waste and doing away with surplus Federal employees.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I have no doubt that savings can be accomplished; in my opinion, no member of the exclusively majority-minded subcommittee which passed upon this resolution can take a stand upon this floor or in the committee, when it reassembles this afternoon, and give a bill of particulars as to the reduction which it is proposed to make.

Mr. BRIDGES. Let me say to the Senator from Wyoming that I could take the stand and give a bill of particulars.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I hope the Senator will do so.

Mr. BRIDGES. But I shall not do it, because in that way the work of the Appropriations Committee would be prejudged.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am very grateful to the Senator for his statement that in that way the work of the Appropriations Committee would be prejudged, because the Senator from New Hampshire knows that the Appropriations Committee—not the joint committee—is the authority. If the Senator from New Hampshire admits my point, that is all I propose to say about it.

Mr. BRIDGES. I do not admit anything of the kind.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes, Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire has admitted it, because he has made the statement in the affirmative. I do not know of anything greater than the affirmative. Does the Senator from New Hampshire propose to withdraw his affirmative statement and respond in the negative?

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming said that no Senator could rise on this floor or in the committee and give a break-down of what is proposed and show that it is proper.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I further challenge the Senator from New Hampshire to do so.

Mr. BRIDGES. I shall not do so because that is not the intent of the law. The intent of the law is to have an overall ceiling provided, and then let the committee work within the framework of such ceiling.

STABBING IN THE DARK

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the committee is making a stab in the dark; it is wielding a broadax without information. Where that ax will fall if the committees follow the recommendations of this report, no one can tell. It is clear from what has been said in the Senate this afternoon and it is clear from what was said in the committee of 102 this morning, that no one is willing to say where reductions will be made.

So, Mr. President, I come back to the conclusion with which I started, namely, that this procedure is a futile and a foolish thing. It is futile because it will not accomplish any objective. It is foolish because it tends to lead the people of the United States to believe that one thing will happen, when actually another thing will follow.

Mr. President, let me say further to the Members of the majority party that when they adopt this resolution proposing a reduction of $6,000,000,000 or $4,500,000,000 or $4,100,000,000 in the President's budget, and when subsequently they fail to carry it out, as they most certainly will fail, they will hear from the people.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from New Mexico was first on his feet, requesting that I yield.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, we should not have other interruptions at the moment. The Senator from New Mexico, as I understand, wishes to ask a question.

Mr. HATCH. I thought the Senator from Wyoming had concluded.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. HATCH. I have been trying to obtain the floor in my own right, and I thought the Senator from Wyoming had finished.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No, Mr. President; the Senator from New Mexico misunderstood me. I wish to make a few remarks with respect to the chart now hanging on the wall.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator now yield to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Let me say I think it is most unfair for a distinguished Senator to attempt to prejudge what the Appropriations Committee will do, and then to criticize the majority party by saying that when it reduces the tremendous budget proposed by the present administration, it will fail the people of the United States. I say it is most regrettable that such a statement should come from a Senator who has so vast a knowledge of governmental affairs.

Furthermore, Mr. President, regardless of whether the Senator from Wyoming can tell me whether he is going to split birdseeds insofar as this resolution is concerned, let me say that there is a mandate which we shall have to accept. Every taxpayer in the United States is going to expect both the minority and the majority parties to cut the expenses of the Federal Government and thus reduce taxes and the costs of the various governmental bureaus, which have swollen so greatly under an administration which has remained in power for 14 years. Let me say that I am one who is going to vote to make that cut, regardless of the resolution to which reference has been made.

[Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COOPER in the chair). The occupants of the galleries will be in order.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am very grateful to the Senator from Nebraska for that statement because in a moment I shall show him that if the proposal which he has just made is carried out, the result will be to endanger the American way of life and the free-enterprise system.

Mr. MORSE rose.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at this time?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I ask the Senator from Nebraska to pardon me for a moment.

Mr. WHERRY. Yes. But will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall yield in a moment. The Senator from Oregon rose first, and I now yield to him.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Wyoming for yielding to me.

As one Member of the Senate on the Republican side of the aisle, I wish to commend the statement the Senator from Wyoming has made. I agree with every syllable of it. As one Republican Senator, I wish to say that I know of no mandate given by the people of the United States to the Congress of the United States that it shall cut taxes until it first does two things——

[Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon will suspend for a moment. The Chair must state that if further demonstrations are made by the occupants of the galleries the galleries will be cleared.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I was saying that the Congress does not have a mandate to cut taxes until it does two things: First, make very clear that we provide for the United States a budget which will be sufficient to enable us to maintain our national security and second, squeeze from that budget every wasted dollar, and apply the savings on the national debt, so that we shall not deceive the people of the United States as I charge that some Republican leaders are deceiving them. They deceive them if they cut the budget and reduce taxes and at the same time so depreciate the value of the United States dollar as to take out of the pockets of the taxpayers many more dollars, because of their depreciated value, than they could save by tax reduction made for political purposes.

Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to meet the Senator from Nebraska or any other Republican leader in the Senate of the United States on the platforms of America, before the American people, on the issue whether the American people, who know the facts, want the type of tax-reduction program which the Senator from Nebraska is trying to sell to them.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to yield for a question, but not to permit the Senator to take part in the debate which he has brought about with the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I observe that the Senator from Wyoming believes in cloture, for it is obvious that he is attempting to shut off the answer I would make.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from Nebraska can make his answer in his own time. I do not wish to stay here all afternoon while the two able Republican Senators debate among themselves.

Mr. WHERRY. Well, Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator yield to me, so as to permit me to ask a question.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Very well; I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Does not the Senator from Wyoming admit, if he wishes to be fair about this matter——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I always wish to be fair.

Mr. WHERRY. I believe the Senator does, and that is why I prefaced my question with those words, for I wish to direct attention to them. Let me say that I am not quarreling about the language of the resolution. The first time I saw it was in this very Chamber today. Let me say that I voted for the reorganization bill. It seems to me that if the Senator will read the remainder of the paragraph, he will understand the sense of what the committee meant.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I read the entire paragraph before the Senator from Nebraska entered the Chamber.

Mr. WHERRY. I did not hear the Senator read it.

I wish to say that I am as anxious as is the Senator from Wyoming to provide for adequate national defense. I voted for every military appropriation which came before the Senate. I never questioned one of them, and I wish to have the Senator know that. But a genuine interest in national defense does not mean that we cannot make any reduction at all in the number of governmental employees, so as to decrease the number of employees from 2,100,000 to 1,600,000, as Mr. Webb has suggested to the committee in a confidential report. That means that we can cut 500,000 employees from the Federal Government pay roll and never even touch the budget for the Military Establishment. Certainly the Senator from Wyoming does not wish to take the position that the American people should be taxed almost out of existence by continuing to have taken from them $38,000,000,000 annually. I remind the Senator that the time will come when it will be impossible to continue to take such tremendous sums from them.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I agree with the objective which the Senator states.

Mr. WHERRY. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator will pardon me, but I am going to demonstrate to him now, if he will permit me to illustrate the point——

Mr. WHERRY. I should be glad to.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Emotion will not settle this problem. It is going to be settled solely upon a basis of the facts.

Mr. WHERRY. Certainly.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I desire now to invite the attention of the Members of the Senate to the chart in front of the desk, which can very properly be called the fever chart of free enterprise.

NATIONAL DEBT EXCEEDS NATIONAL INCOME

Mr. President, there are three lines upon this chart. They represent the trend of the Federal debt, the national income, and Federal receipts, over the period from 1910 to 1946.

The red line shows that the national debt of the United States today has reached a towering pinnacle, greater than any nation on the face of this earth ever incurred, even in relation to its own resources. And more important than that, it shows that in 1944, for the first time in the history of this Government, the national debt exceeded the national income; and when I speak of national income, I mean the income of the people, of all the people. The national debt today is about $259,000,000,000. We fought World War I with a national debt of about $26,000,000,000.

Senators talk about reducing taxes. I should like to call their attention to the plain facts. Observe the red line representing the Federal debt in the period from 1920 to 1932, showing merely a slight reduction. Five times during that period, the 12-year period from 1920 to 1932, the Congress of the United States passed income-tax-reduction laws, and the result was that, although by about 1926 the Federal debt had reached its lowest level since the peak of World War I, a depression came upon the country which caused the Federal debt to rise, because the last 2 years of the Hoover administration were deficit years.

Income-tax reduction did not pay off the debt. We left World War I with $26,000,000,000 of debt. We entered the Roosevelt administration in March 1933 with a debt of less than $2,000,000,000 below that, and then was added the debt incurred in the effort to fight the depression.

Observe that that debt never reached $50,000,000,000. It was not until we began to prepare for World War II, in 1940, that the debt rose above $50,000,000,000. But all this time the national income was sometimes twice as great as the public debt. Always it was greater. Sometimes it fell a little.

The line on the chart in the year 1932 shows the slip that took place as a result of the depression of 1929. National income dropped, and the national debt rose. National income dropped then without any tax-reduction law, and the Federal revenues, the lowest line on the chart, also dropped without any tax-reduction law, because when the people are not able to work, when factories close, when stores close, and people lose employment, then the national income declines and the tax receipts decline. That cannot be avoided. It is an inevitable result. It follows just as the rising of the sun follows the setting of the sun. The two things are absolutely tied together.

The important thing is to observe that it was not until 1944 that the national debt rose above the national income. But observe how the national income had increased. In 1942 the national income was almost $150,000,000,000. In 1944 it was $150,000,000,000. Then it went above $150,000,000,000. Today the national income is $165,000,000,000, the highest peak ever reached in the history of this or any other country. If we do not pay off the debt while we have the money with which to pay it, if we do not pay off the debt while the national income is at this high level, we will never pay it off.

Observe that our Federal revenues, despite all the heavy taxation, never reached $50,000,000,000 in a single year. We did not fight the war with current revenues; we fought the war with borrowed money, and that borrowed money is a mortgage against the future of every man, woman, and child in America. It is a mortgage on future production.

CARELESS TAX CUTS A THREAT TO FREE ENTERPRISE

Mr. President, if we imitate the errors of the period from 1920 to 1930, and reduce taxes without applying the money, first of all, upon the national debt, the result will be the same as that shown on this chart, but because the public debt in World War II is 10 times greater than the public debt in World War I, there will be brought about a crash from it which it is doubtful if the capitalistic system itself could survive.

What is going on in the world, Mr. President? Everywhere we see written across the sky the story of revolution and disaster. We see the free-enterprise system abandoned. We see totalitarian governments arise. We see socialistic governments arise. Only here in the United States are the people defending the system of capitalism.

The Communists tell us, "The capitalists are too greedy to recognize their own welfare. Give them a chance; they will snap at private advantage, they will snap at special privilege. They will not work together to save their enterprise. They will be so greedy that they will make it impossible to pay off the debt."

We can read that in any Communist speech; we can read it in the books of Lenin; we can read it in the Communist propaganda wherever it goes. "Capital," they say, "is too greedy to serve its own purpose. It will wreck itself."

Mr. President, observe the difference shown on this chart. Public debt, $259,000,000,000. Federal revenues, somewhat under $50,000,000,000, a little more than $40,000,000,000, as a matter of fact—but the national income of the people, $165,000,000,000.

The same resolution from which I quoted earlier contains another provision which is tremendously significant. I read this sentence now from page 5.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me read this sentence first, and then I shall yield. I read from page 5 of the committee report:

The committee believes that on the basis of all available information, and on the basis of a continuing national income at substantially present levels, the estimated receipts for the fiscal year 1948 will aggregate $39,100,000,000.

"On the basis of the present national income." I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. I merely wanted to have the Senator point out that the resolution provides for the very thing for which he is arguing; that is, for paying in the neighborhood of two and one-half billion dollars on the national debt. Is not that true?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I understand that the objective of those who are sponsoring this movement is to bring about a reduction of two and one-half billion dollars on the national debt.

Mr. WHERRY. Certainly.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. And a reduction of two and a half billion dollars in the income taxes.

Mr. WHERRY. Yes.

PROPOSED REDUCTIONS MEAN LITTLE TO THE RANK AND FILE

Mr. O'MAHONEY. And the reduction in income taxes, under the proposal that has been presented to the Ways and Means Committee of the House for a 20-percent across-the-board reduction, will result in savings of cents and a few dollars for the rank and file of the people, and savings of tens and twenties and hundreds of thousands of dollars for those in the higher brackets, who have made tremendous profits out of the rise in the national debt.

Mr. WHERRY. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. WHERRY. So far as I can discover, there is nothing in the resolution about adjusting income taxes straight across the board.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, no; it is not in the resolution.

Mr. WHERRY. Then that is beside the question.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. But it is in the bill which has been introduced.

Mr. WHERRY. But not in this resolution?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; not in the resolution.

Mr. WHERRY. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. I think the Senator from Wyoming has made an able argument——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I thank the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. And I agree with his theory as to the reduction in the national debt. I submitted in the Senate a year ago a proposal for the sale of surplus property and applying the proceeds on the national debt, and, if I recall correctly, the Senator voted against it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do not recall.

Mr. WHERRY. I very distinctly recall. In fact, I think the Senator spoke against it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do not think the Senator has recently looked at the record.

Mr. WHERRY. There is now pending a proposal advocating what some of us have advocated since 1943.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, there has never been a time that I have not advocated reducing the national debt. I have been preaching the danger to the American way of life that proceeds from the increasing Federal debt.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct; there can be no argument about that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That has been my position since before the Senator from Nebraska became a Member of this body.

Mr. WHERRY. There can be no argument on that point; we should reduce the debt.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. WHERRY. Not only should the debt be reduced but correspondingly the funds necessary to service the debt as well as taxes could be reduced by cutting the budget. That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am saying now to the Senator that the result, in my opinion, of the action which he advocates will not be to reduce the debt but to bring about another depression.

The paragraph of the resolution which I just read clearly stated that the recommendation which the Senator is defending is based upon the assumption that the national income will remain substantially at present levels, which is the highest level ever reached.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, I want to say to those who are good enough to be listening that if the national income is reduced $10,000,000,000, the inevitable result will be a reduction of $3,000,000,000 in Federal revenue; and it will come about without the benefit of any law reducing income taxes.

We are speaking, I will say to the Senator, from experience. Experience after World War I demonstrated that when we followed the policy of reducing income taxes before reducing the debt, a condition was brought about which plunged the country into a terrible depression.

WAR PROFITS SHOULD HELP PAY WAR DEBTS

If, instead of reducing income taxes during that period, we had insisted that the war profiteers of World War I pay their share of the debt by taking it from them in taxes after the war, the war debt would have been reduced before the election of 1932. I have no doubt that, if it had been reduced, there would not have been the overturn of 1932. The election of Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1932 was brought about by the fact that the unsound fiscal policy, which it is now proposed to reenact, brought the American Nation to the verge of destruction.

I say to the Senator that, when we had that narrow escape after World War I, with a debt of only $26,000,000,000, it is quite impossible to imagine what may happen with a debt of $259,000,000,000.

O, Mr. President, more is involved than a political argument for the election of a President in 1948.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator said he would yield before he went to a new subject. The Senator is now on a new subject.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I did not say that I would yield before I went to a new subject.

Mr. WHERRY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. But I am happy to yield to the Senator now.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to call attention to the fact that the Senator is taking a constant figure, but he cannot predict, and no one else can predict, what the national budget will be.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Not even the Committee on the Budget.

Mr. WHERRY. No one can predict what taxes will be. For example, the Senator will agree with me that no doubt a reduction in taxes would attract more business, which would become a factor in the picture. The Senator cannot take a constant figure to prove his point.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator, who is the chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Small Business, that reducing taxes will not bring new business into the field

CONCENTRATION OF ECONOMIC POWER BREEDS DEPRESSION

That cannot be done until we put a stop to the concentration of economic power, which brought about the conditions which resulted in the depression of 1929, and which will result in another depression unless we take steps now.

I join the Senator in proposing incentive taxes, which will stimulate the investment of private capital; but that is the first step.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. WHERRY. Did the Senator mean he would join me on the Small Business Committee in doing that?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Small Business Committee has no legislative powers, as the Senator well knows.

Mr. WHERRY. The committee could suggest a legislative policy.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I would suggest it. I have been preaching it for 10 years. I filed several reports with the Senate urging incentive taxes, to create an incentive for the investment of private capital in private business, so as to put an end to the system which we have had about investment of Federal funds.

FUNDS TO FIGHT FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE MAY BE ENDANGERED

Ah, Mr. President, the Senator comes from the great State of Nebraska, a State which is interested in livestock. He no doubt knows that only this week there was before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry a bill to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to extend Federal funds to fight the foot-and-mouth disease in Mexico. Where is the money to be obtained, if we adopt the proposed budget? Where are we to get that money, if we put a ceiling upon appropriations before knowing what the facts are?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. WHERRY. The suggested amount is $600,000,000.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is a suggestion, without money to effectuate it.

Mr. WHERRY. What the Senator has in mind happened to be my resolution. At the time of its introduction there was discussion of a sum of about twenty-five million.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will say to the Senator that last year the Commodity Credit Corporation spent $143,000,000 to buy the domestic wool crop of the United States, and unless we do that again this year the domestic wool crop will be lost, and the sheep growers of Nebraska, Wyoming, Idaho, Oregon, and all the West will be liquidated.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator from Virginia this morning, before the joint committee, stated that the Government-owned corporations which have loaned the money which the borrowers have paid back with interest, have now a surplus in excess of $10,000,000,000, and yet they are coming to the Congress this year and asking for an appropriation of $875,000,000 to continue their operations. A saving can be made of the whole eight hundred and seventy-five million, because they have $10,000,000,000 surplus derived in part from the wool growers of Nebraska.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is proving the point I am trying to make, that the conclusions upon which he relies are the statements of Senators, and not the result of any hearings.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the statement to which I referred was made by the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], who is the chairman of the Committee on Nonessential Federal Expenditures, and I doubt if there is a man on the floor of the Senate who is more of an authority on expenditures than is the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MORSE. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Wyoming two or three questions, based on his discussion, as I understand him.

May I say that I think it is most regrettable that every Member of the Senate is not present to hear the Senator from Wyoming, because I think his is one of the most able presentations of the budgetary problem I have yet heard on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is very kind.

Mr. MORSE. As I understand the Senator from Wyoming, he is pointing out that if we are going to make a saving of some $5,000,000,000 in round numbers in the budget—and I certainly think we should make the saving if we can make it——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

CUT THE DEBT BEFORE CUTTING TAXES

Mr. MORSE. I know the Senator from Wyoming does, too; but the major point of the Senator from Wyoming as I understand, is that if we are going to make that saving, then as a preventive of depression we ought to apply the $5,000,000,000 on the national debt rather than half of it on a tax-reduction program.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Absolutely.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from Wyoming is making the additional point that unless we do that, we run the danger of a repetition of the fiscal problem that faced us in the 1920's, when we reduced taxes and went into a period of inflation. We cut the value of the American dollar, and millions of our fellow Americans walked the streets unemployed.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is danger magnified 10 times, because the debt now is 10 times greater than it was after World War I.

Mr. MORSE. May I ask the Senator a question on one other point?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. MORSE. Does the Senator from Wyoming agree with the junior Senator from Oregon that as of now the particular income boom that we are having in America—and we certainly are having one—flows primarily from economic dislocations resulting from the war?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Unquestionably.

Mr. MORSE. That being true, then the business people and the income earners of America ought to be willing to forego tax reductions and pay on income growing out of the war boom a fair and reasonable income tax, and apply that tax out of patriotic duty to the national debt?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, unless we do that we are courting disaster; we are inviting disaster—nay, I think we are making it inevitable, because it is obvious, when we consider the fact that our revenues now, our receipts now, are well below $50,000,000,000, and our debt is $259,000,000,000, that if we take $2,500,000,000 off the debt, and $2,500,000,000 off the income, then at the rate of more than 5 to 1 we are favoring the income taxpayers. We should not make that disproportional reduction. The total amount that is saved, whatever it may be, should be applied upon reduction of the debt and not upon the taxes.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, one more question: Am I correct in understanding the Senator from Wyoming to say in connection with the resolution which has been brought before us and the proposal to cut the budget a specific number of billions of dollars that we are not being given any evidence by the Joint Legislative Budget Committee as to where the cuts are going to be made within the budget?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is specifically avoided.

Mr. MORSE. Which leads me to my last question because the Senator, too, represents the great empire of the West, and I think he will agree with me that over the long years the people of our great section of the country have found themselves the victims frequently of exploitation by great financial interests of the East. We have been a rich source for eastern financiers.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. We have been the colonial dependents of concentrated capital in the East, as was once very well stated by an able observer of the economic scene.

Mr. MORSE. We certainly have been so treated. Does the Senator from Wyoming think that it is amiss for the junior Senator from Oregon to raise this question, namely, that certainly those of us representing the great Western States cannot justify voting for any such blanket budget reduction until we first know specifically whether or not it is proposed to cut into the great wealth-creating projects in the West which must be finished if we are going to have any economic stability in that area, and if we do not have it there, we are not going to have it in the Nation, either?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think the Senator is quite right.

THREAT TO WESTERN DEVELOPMENT

Mr. MORSE. I desire, Mr. President, to emphasize that point if I do not emphasize any others. I think we might just as well come to understand each other on the floor of the Senate. I think we ought to work in unity, East and West and North and South. But I think it is perfectly clear that we must be assured that our budget makers see the distinction between eliminating waste in national expenditures and preventing the completion of great wealth-producing projects in the West. I refer to reclamation; I refer to the great dams that must be completed if we are going to supply the power for the industrialization of the West.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator means, does he not, that a very definite war is being waged now against expenditures for public projects for the production of power.

Mr. MORSE. That is true. I close by saying that I think we western Senators must keep that issue clearly before the Senate, and I hope there will be no loss in our membership from the West in that fight. Let me say very clearly to both parties that I think the people of the West will hold them politically responsible for the action they may take on this budget, and have no hesitancy in saying that neither party can win in 1948 without the West.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me long enough to ask unanimous consent to have placed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, two tables which deal with the subject we are now discussing?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I previously stated that I thought we could make a saving largely outside the armed forces. I wish to place in the RECORD a table prepared by the Committee on Postwar Taxation, which proposes a reduction in the Budget to $31,577,000,000.

I also wish to place in the RECORD a table showing expenditures of the Federal Government by departments and agencies, comparing the expenditures in the fiscal years 1939, 1940, 1941, 1946, and 1948.

I think the table I first referred to shows beyond the shadow of a doubt that we cannot only reduce the National Budget by $5,000,000,000, but that we can take care of our fixed charges, we can apply upon the debt $2,600,000,000, and we can operate the Government just as efficiently as it is being operated now and yet save the taxpayers a considerable amount toward the 20-percent cut we are speaking of, even if we cannot, to use a slang expression, hit that 20-percent cut right on the nose.

Mr. President, I agree with much of what the distinguished Senator from Wyoming has said. Certainly I agree with him in toto respecting the question of the reduction of the debt. There is no doubt on that subject. I also agree with him in his statement that we cannot continue to plan our operations on the basis of a national income of $172,000,000,000, which, based on the income for the last quarter of last year would represent the income for that year. But certainly I take the position just as sincerely as the Senator from Wyoming does that the proper thing to do is to reduce the budget and cut Government expenses, but at the same time service the debt, as has been outlined by the distinguished Senator.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the two tables I referred to may be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, again I say that the proposed resolution which is coming before us was prepared without study, without a presentation of the facts to the full committee. It is action without thought, Mr. President; it is action which ignores the facts; it is action which is bound to bring disaster, because it is common human experience in individual life as well as the life of governing bodies that when one acts without the facts one is inviting disaster.

I rise here today only to protest against doing a futile thing such as this is confessed to be.

Mr. President, I could take the figures which the Senator from Nebraska has just inserted in the RECORD, and analyze them, and I could show also, it seems to me, that it will be impossible to save anything like $6,000,000,000, or even $4,000,000,000. The budget for national defense, as has been shown by the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY], of some $11,000,000,000, was sent to Congress after the requests of both the War Department and the Navy Department had been severely cut. Recommendations for other items have also been cut. But the figures in the Budget for the armed services are slightly more than $11,000,000,000. Budget recommendations for veterans' services, for taking care of wounded and sick veterans of World War II, as well as World War I, amount to more than $7,000,000,000. As realistic men, we know that no reduction will be made in that item. It will probably be increased. But add $7,000,000,000 to $11,000,000,000, and we have $18,000,000,000. We have not yet taken into consideration interest on the national debt, which is estimated at $5,000,000,000. Call it $4,000,000,000. Adding $4,000,000,000 to $18,000,000,000, we have $22,000,000,000.

There is a contractual obligation on the part of the Government to refund taxes which is estimated at approximately two and one-half billion dollars. If we add two and one-half billion dollars to $22,000,000,000, we have twenty-four and one-half billion dollars.

Then consider the obligations for social security. Are we going to repeal that law? Certainly not. Those obligations have increased because of conditions.

By the time we add together the inescapable items, items which every observer takes into consideration—even the National City Bank of New York in its monthly bulletin which came to Senators' desks within the week—and then add comparable items for the ordinary affairs of government for which we appropriated in 1939, we have a budget which almost approximates the $38,000,000,000 budget sent here by the President.

My point is simply this: We are endangering the American way of life by thus acting hastily and without thought. The American way of life will be defended and preserved nowhere if it is not defended and preserved in this Chamber. It cannot be controverted that the profit system and the loss system go hand in hand. We must contemplate the danger of losses. When our national income reaches the pinnacle of $165,000,000,000 and we look back upon our experience, we know that in all probability it will be decreased, and when it is decreased our revenue will fall. If the experience of the 10 years following World War I is any criterion, we shall be headed straight for a depression unless we adopt it as our determined policy not to cut taxes while income is up, but to apply every dollar of surplus revenue to the reduction of the debt.

Mr. President, last night I dictated a statement with respect to this matter. The statement was presented to the committee of 102 this morning. It deals with the same subject that I have discussed. Probably I have said some of the same things. However, I ask unanimous consent that that statement may be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPUBLICAN BUDGET PROGRAM A TIME BOMB UNDER CAPITALISM

(Statement of Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, to the Joint Committee on the Legislative Budget, February 14, 1947)

Congress cannot afford to make any reduction in the President's budget for the purpose of tax reduction if it desires to preserve the capitalistic system.

It is not too much to say that the $6,000,000,000 budget reduction program now submitted to the Legislative Budget Committee is a time bomb which can easily destroy the American way of life.

For the first time in the history of the United States the national debt reached a point in 1944 in excess of the total income of all the people.

The Civil War and World War I were both followed by depressions, and the depression following World War I was deeper and longer in duration than any in history, but there never was a time during or following any war or any crisis that the national debt became so great as to exceed the income of the people. Now it is approximately $90,000,000,000 greater than the national income, although the national income in 1946 was the greatest on record, greater by $4,000,000,000 than it was in 1945, the previous all-time peak.

The national debt is represented by bonds of the United States held by banks, insurance companies, investors, big business people, little business people, and workers. It is an investment in America because it is a mortgage on all future production.

This mortgage is so great that it requires the people of the United States to pay out of their earnings an annual interest charge of $5,000,000,000. This is where spending should be reduced; $5,000,000,000 is greater by far than any sum ever received by the Government of the United States from individual income-tax payments prior to World War II. It was not until 1942 that receipts from individual income-tax payments aggregated over three billions.

If we adopt a program now of reducing taxes while the people are enjoying the greatest income in history, the inevitable result will be to undermine the ability of the Government to pay the interest on the national debt, and when that is done the value of every United States bond will be impaired.

Business leaders and political leaders who clamor now for a reduction of taxes are playing the game of the Communists because they are confident that capitalism is too greedy to save itself.

A year ago the national debt was a little more than $279,000,000,000. It has now been reduced to a little more than two hundred and fifty-nine billions. That is two hundred and fifty-nine thousand millions, and the national income last year was one hundred and sixty-five billions. If that national income begins to decline while the national debt remains at this dizzy pinnacle, the capitalistic system will be through. The first task of Government, therefore, is to reduce this debt while keeping the economy running so that national income will not fall.

I have a chart here which shows the relation between the national debt, the national income, and Federal revenue. This chart shows how, for the first time in history, the debt exceeded the income in 1944. It shows how, by heavy taxation for purposes of the war, we raised the revenue of the Government until it exceeded $40,000,000,000 in a single year. It shows also that we paid for the war, not out of current revenues, but out of pledging the future earnings of the people of the United States. To reduce Federal revenue now is to invite repudiation.

But it is said the Government is wasting billions. The figures presented on behalf of this $6,000,000,000 reduction program disprove that, because the advocates of this reduction acknowledge themselves that to make the cut they propose, it is necessary to reduce the expenditure for national defense.

We cannot win permanent peace for the world if we strip ourselves now of the ability to defend ourselves. If there should be a third world war, we will not be given the time to prepare as we were in World War I and World War II. We will be the first to bear the brunt of the attack. Cut the Army and Navy appropriations now, and we give notice to the world that once again, even though we know that this is the atomic age, we are attempting to retire into political and economic isolation.

If we do that, we sign the death warrant of the American way of life because there is no people on the face of the globe to preserve the American way of life unless we do it.

DECISION OF THE SUPREME COURT ON THE HATCH ACT

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, this week the Supreme Court, with majority, concurring, and dissenting opinions, upheld and sustained the validity of the law enacted several years ago prohibiting certain pernicious political activities by employees of the Federal Government and also those employees of the States who are paid, in whole or in part, with Federal funds. The cases had been pending in the courts for some time. Naturally, those of us who were interested in this legislation had watched the progress of the litigation with interest and some concern.

Because I wanted to express thoughts which I have long entertained and held independent of any argument or decision of the Court, I have refrained from reading the Court's opinions until I could make the brief statement I make at this time, after the cases have been finally decided.

The attack on the law was based in part upon the contention that it was unconstitutional in that it placed undue restrictions and restraints upon the rights of individuals to assemble freely, and denied, in certain respects, freedom of speech. Other grounds may have been urged, but generally, as I understand the contentions, it was seriously argued that the liberties and freedom of the individual employee were restrained and denied by this law. This, indeed, was a grave charge. Such assertion of constitutional rights should always be treated with utmost seriousness and consideration. Questions of personal liberties call for the highest degree of care and solicitude. Within the framework, intent, and purpose of the Constitution every freedom and liberty guaranteed by that great document must be protected and preserved if free government is to survive. It is indeed gratifying that the Court exercised such care and solicitude in deciding these issues of such tremendous importance. By such processes are the rights and liberties of all citizens protected and free government made secure.

The questions presented were not new. They were discussed and considered when the legislation was first conceived. None of those who sponsored the legislation and none who voted for it desired in any way to infringe upon any constitutional right or privilege of any employee of either Federal or State government. The legislation was drawn in the light of long-established law and custom. It was drawn with the firm conviction that the Government not only had the right but the high duty and responsibility to protect itself against insidious and dangerous influences which might eventually operate to the destruction of that greatest of all freedoms, the freedom of the people to have their officials of government chosen and selected in free elections, uninfluenced by those who might seek to perpetuate themselves or their party in power through the means and agencies of government itself.

It is understood by all that it is the constitutional right of every citizen to speak freely, to assemble peacefully, and to participate in every legitimate political activity. When the Congress passed the legislation it recognized all of these rights. It sought to transgress none of them. But, as was declared by Mr. Justice Holmes, when he was a justice of the Supreme Court of the State of Massachusetts, it is true that no person has any constitutional right to be employed by government. The Government does have the right to protect itself against pernicious activities of its own employees. Persons employed in government accept employment with full knowledge that government service is different from ordinary employment; that in accepting the benefits—and they are many—which flow from employment in the Government service, they must necessarily accept the burdens which go with it, provided, of course, that those burdens are not arbitrary, vicious, or capricious. The burden imposed by the law against pernicious political activity are not arbitrary, vicious, or capricious. They do not violate the Constitution. They are wise and proper restraints intended to protect government itself, and are not intended to restrict unduly any constitutional right of the individual.

In making these comments, I am thinking of other matters of far greater importance and of deeper significance than the case which the Supreme Court has just decided. We live in a world where freedom and liberty are more precious today than they have been for many generations. It is a world in which freedom and liberty seem to be passing out of the minds of men. Save in our own country and perhaps in a few remote places throughout the rest of the world, there is no freedom and there is no liberty.

The theory of government which makes the state all and the individual nothing, whether we call it totalitarian, Communist, or Fascist, has swept and is sweeping today over countries where once brightly flamed the light of individual liberty. Never was it more true than now that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." Of this I am so profoundly and deeply convinced that I constantly want to raise my voice in warning that the freedom and liberty we accept as a matter of course may yet go down beneath the rising tide of statism.

Strong as is our Nation, great as are her vast resources, mighty as is her power in men, and sublime as is our faith in her institutions of free government, we dare not forget that we as a nation and a people are still in our youth. Government by the people yet remains in the testing period. We have yet to prove in our generation and in the generations to come whether the people can rule and govern themselves. Free government, even here, is still in its testing period.

To protect government against pernicious influences is our highest duty. In protecting free government, we preserve the individual freedom and liberty of every citizen. In preserving the individual liberties of all the people we promote the freedom of those whose rights may, upon superficial or casual consideration, appear to have been invaded.

The freedom of the individual cannot be greater than the liberty of all. But liberty itself is not an absolute term. Many are its limitations. Liberty, unbridled, loose, and running wild, becomes tyranny. When liberty is license, freedom can become a mockery.

Profound as are these truths, they are not always remembered. We forget that liberties won by strength and arms can be lost by devious methods of many kinds, by treachery, by neglect and by abuse. In her excesses, liberty may become a malignant force, even as an excess of virtue may become a positive vice, as occurred when religious fanatics in our own country burned citizens at the stake under the pretext that they were witches in league with evil spirits from the lower regions of his satanic majesty's kingdom.

True as may be the words I have spoken, it yet remains to make them applicable to specific conditions in current national affairs. It is not enough to speak of liberty and freedom alone. Their connotations are so great, and their ramifications so many, that the deep significance of their meaning may be lost in the sweeping generalities of the terms. It is not enough to say that the excessive exercise of individual rights and liberties may often jeopardize the rights and liberties of the people as a whole. More must be said. There are conditions where selfish actions or interests of groups, individuals, or people can imperil the liberties of all of us if they are continued unrestrained. For instance, the right to engage in business should never be denied. The right to make profits is one of the freedoms under a system of government where free enterprise is one of its essential parts. Yet, in the exercise of these fundamental freedoms, men engaged in business and industry can so build, as they have done, huge monopolistic combines and organizations so strong and powerful in the Nation-wide or even world-wide scope of their enterprise that individuals are completely eliminated from that particular field of business activity and their liberties under free enterprise are absolutely destroyed.

To protect against such abuses of liberties under a system of free enterprise, antitrust laws and similar legislation came into being. They are restraints upon claimed freedoms. Without them the freedom of many could be lost by the undue and excessive operations of a few.

Today there are no more important issues than those affecting labor and management. There was a time when management, exercising its claimed freedoms and liberties, used the lockout, spies, and even gunmen, to enforce its liberties and to destroy the liberties and freedom of the workingmen, and they were destroyed by those methods. To safeguard against the abuse of liberty by management, certain restraints and restrictions had to be imposed and were imposed, in order that the workingman might exercise his own freedom and liberty.

Mr. President, today it is not denied, and cannot be denied, that men have the right to organize into groups, unions, federations, and associations to protect and to promote their own interests. When that is done, vast power can be built up; and such power, when so built, can be used so excessively and can be so abused that it may become a menace to the safety, the liberty, and the security of all. Even those responsible for such organizations can so use the liberties they possess that, if they are abused, in the end they will destroy themselves and their own cause.

Mr. President, I give these instances merely to stress again the truth that liberty and freedom are relative terms, and to warn that even as there is danger in their denial, so also is there danger in their abuse. Powerful agencies for human good, they can become evil forces resulting in their own destruction. With tolerance, forbearance, patience, wisdom, and justice, safeguarded against both denial and abuse, protected even against itself, liberty can live and it can survive, even though it be assailed by alien faiths and beliefs, such as is being done all over the world today. But while properly protected liberty can live and endure, it also can be lost, stolen, and betrayed.

Milton said it better when he wrote:

> Unless that liberty, which is of such a kind as arms can neither procure nor take away, which alone is the fruit of piety, of justice, of temperance, and unadulterated virtue, shall have taken deep root in your minds and hearts, there will not long be wanting one who will snatch from you by treachery what you have acquired by arms. (The Second Defence of the People of England.)

Finally, Mr. President, I wish to say that against the day when pernicious and evil influences may be paving the way for the treachery of one who would snatch the liberties of all, Congress had the solemn duty to put a mild restraint upon the freedom of its own employees. Such is the decision, this week, of the highest court in the land. It has spoken well. It has decided wisely.

OCEAN TRANSPORTATION SERVICE TO AND FROM ALASKA

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, out of order, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution providing for continuation of the authority of the Maritime Commission with respect to Alaskan shipping. I send the joint resolution to the desk and ask that it be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 65) to authorize the United States Maritime Commission to make provision for certain ocean transportation service to and from Alaska until July 1, 1948, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, a similar joint resolution was introduced in the House of Representatives last week and hearings were held on it as late as yesterday in the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The House joint resolution has been reported favorably by the unanimous vote of the House committee, and action on the floor of the House probably will be taken on it on Monday. The joint resolution again calls attention to a particular problem affecting the Pacific Northwest and the Territory of Alaska.

At the last session of Congress, on December 12, 1945, and prior thereto in hearings in the Senate committee, I called attention to the deplorable and acute problem facing Alaskan shipping and affecting the people of the Pacific coast and the Territory of Alaska itself. Mr. President, although the situation was bad at that time, today it is growing worse.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], the distinguished majority leader, will recall the conferences and discussions on the matter which we had in the committee at that time, as well as the discussions which occurred on the floor of the Senate.

In a nutshell, the situation is as follows: The Alaskan fleet, namely, the private shipping lines which run from Puget Sound to Alaska, is composed entirely of over-age ships, the average age of the ships being approximately 18 years. Those vessels took a severe beating during the war. They have been used constantly by the War Shipping Administration and are still being operated by it. The Alaskan run itself is a run of no small proportions. The result is that the ships are gradually deteriorating.

During the war a great many vessels were built in the United States; and at the last session of Congress, after lengthy hearings before the then Committee on Commerce, the Congress passed a ship-disposal bill which would help the shippers and operators in every other part of the United States and on every other run by permitting them to purchase from the Maritime Commission, at a reasonable price, available ships to replace vessels which, because of the wear and tear and heavy use during the war, had deteriorated. In this way newer ships could be obtained and the fleets could be operated more economically. However, that measure does not apply to the Alaskan situation. None of the ships available for disposal through the Maritime Commission are adaptable to the Alaskan trade, which requires a peculiar type of ship. In view of the present high construction costs, the Alaskan operators cannot construct such ships without having in the ships a capital investment that would require an increase in rates. Hearings have been held recently on their petition for an increase in the rates to Alaska, which are already excessive. The average Alaskan pays approximately 10 percent of his gross income for freight rates on goods transported to Alaska. So we can see what the situation means to the Alaskans.

In the meantime the Maritime Administration and the War Shipping Administration have been operating the ships plying in the Alaskan trade. The former operators are not anxious to take back the ships, for the sole reason, which they assert with some justice, that they cannot operate them under the present rates. The people of the Territory of Alaska are objecting to any increases in rates, for the present rates are excessive. Of course, in the meantime the ships are becoming older. Not only were nine of them sunk during the war, but several of them ran aground; and in the past 3 weeks two more have gone aground, one of them only last night.

So, Mr. President, when February 28 arrives, at which time the authority of the War Shipping Administration and Maritime Commission to continue to operate these ships will expire, the Alaskans will probably be without any waterborne service to Alaska at all. Such a situation would cause serious suffering and difficulty to the entire Territory of Alaska.

The purpose of the joint resolution is to extend to July 1, 1948, the authority of the Maritime Commission to supply this service to the residents of Alaska. Last year we extended it for a period of time so as to permit the continued operation of the ships. Let me say that the joint resolution is the result of conferences between shippers, residents of Alaska, labor, and the Maritime Commission. All are in agreement that the step proposed by the joint resolution is the only temporary solution of the problem at present available. Due to the fact that on February 28 the authority of the Maritime Commission will expire, of course it is vital that some action on this measure be taken next week by the Senate.

As I have already stated, the House committee has held hearings on a similar joint resolution and has voted unanimously to report it favorably. I am informed by my colleagues in the House of Representatives from the State of Washington that formal action on the joint resolution is expected in the House of Representatives on Monday.

The distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which I assume will have jurisdiction of the resolution, has set hearings for next Friday on a measure similar to this. I hope immediate action will be taken at that time, because the situation is critical.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I understand the situation to be as the Senator from Washington has informed us. A joint resolution is pending in the House of Representatives. In the House it was referred to the appropriate committee; and I believe the committee has reported it favorably to the House, with the general understanding, although not a unanimous-consent agreement, that it will be taken up for disposition on the coming Monday.

I think I am warranted in saying that the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which I assume the joint resolution will be referred, will take it up and will reach some disposition of it next week.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I appreciate the interest of the distinguished Senator from Maine.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I shall yield to the Senator in a moment.

Mr. President, let me say that at the last session, when the Senate had before it this problem, which is sectional in nature, but of course involves a great possession and Territory of the United States, the Senator from Maine took a most sympathetic attitude and helped a great deal in the matter, and I appreciate his interest in it now.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Washington for the statement he has just made.

I call attention to the fact that last week Mr. Almon Roth, who is president of the Shipowners' Association of America, testified before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare in regard to another matter, but in the course of his testimony he pointed out the dire straits in which the Alaskan segment of the American merchant marine would find itself if no action was taken to enact the joint resolution to which the senior Senator from Washington has eloquently referred. I am sure that if the other Senators from the west coast were present they would join in the point of view the senior Senator from Washington has expressed and which I am sure the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], whom I see present, shares.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I thank the Senator from Oregon. Of course, both Senators from Oregon have an interest in this matter, because a great deal of the commerce to Alaska originates in the State of Oregon and the great ports along the Columbia River. I wish to say for the junior Senator from Washington and myself that several representatives of both the shippers and Alaskans have been here; we have had many conferences about this matter, and we think the solution suggested is the only proper one.

I might state to the Senator from Maine that the date is made July 1, 1948, mainly at the instance of the Maritime Commission itself, which thought we should have the act run to that time, so that they might have some historical background for meeting the problem, and meeting it permanently.

Under the agreement decided upon in the joint resolution, whereas the Maritime Commission has been operating the ships at a loss, last year of almost $4,000,000, the Commission will be enabled to charter the ships at a nominal fee to the Alaskan operators. The Commission will share in any profits, but all losses will be assumed by the operators.

If the Maritime Commission cannot operate the ships at a profit, it is legitimate to inquire how the operators can operate them and not absorb a terrific loss?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from Washington has now stated some facts in connection with the joint resolution of which I was not informed. I thought the House joint resolution provided for an extension of the operating authority to the Maritime Commission until June 1947. I now understand the Senator to state that it is to be until 1948.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes; until 1948. The purpose is, as I stated before, to afford some historical background to the Commission in taking care of the problem.

I may say to the Senator from Maine that the President of the United States in a recent message to Congress suggested that the Congress extend the war powers in title I of the War Powers Act so as to permit the Maritime Commission to operate certain shipping lines, and Army and Navy shipping lines, to supply local transportation, the over-all continuance of the authority of the Maritime Commission to be to July 1, 1947.

The joint resolution contemplates the Alaska situation as a thing apart, and the Commission is hoping it can have some historical background by that time to enable it to solve the problem. Fixing the date as of July 1, 1948, would give the Government time enough, and if it should work out it would be good business for all concerned. Whereas the Government last year lost approximately $4,000,000 in the operation of the ships, under the agreement in the joint resolution the operators will assume any loss, and if there is any profit it will be divided, and the interest charges, insurance, and the like will be paid by the operators.

The operators believe they can operate at a profit, for the simple reason that the joint resolution would give the Maritime Commission the authority to charter the smaller ships to the Alaskan shippers at a nominal fee; that is, at no cost to the Government, because the ships which can be used on the Alaskan run, and can be adapted in some degree to the Alaskan run, I am informed by the Maritime Commission as a result of conferences, are ships which are tied up anyway. The ships are not what the Maritime Commission calls ships in short supply, they are in long supply; they would not be used anyway; and we think in this way we can get ourselves out of the mess in which we now find ourselves.

I am hoping that we can get quick action in this matter. For the purposes of the record I wish to read what the Maritime Commission said about this subject in its report to Congress dated November 29 of last year. I quote from the report to the Honorable John R. Steelman, Director of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion, and to the President of the United States:

The Alaskan trade presents many problems which must be solved before the commercial steamship lines can again provide service without Government assistance. Such prewar vessels as still remain in service are very much over-age, and the more modern vessels which are available would require extensive changes to fit them for this trade. Operating costs in the Alaskan trade have always been high because of the seasonal nature of the business, adverse weather conditions, difficult harbor operations, and the many small ports that require regular service. With the large increases in labor and material costs that have been imposed on ship operators during the past year, much higher freight revenues are necessary to produce a profitable commercial operation. However, the citizens of Alaska protest that they cannot stand substantially higher freight rates. Meanwhile, both from the standpoint of providing for the basic commercial needs of the Territory and servicing the various United States military establishments in Alaska, the Maritime Commission is required to provide essential freight and passenger services.

During the past season the three prewar common-carrier lines in the Alaskan trades have been operating 8 combination (passenger and cargo) vessels and 16 to 20 freighters for Commission account, regular services being provided between Seattle and other Puget Sound ports and the principal ports in southeast Alaska, southwest Alaska, Kodiak Island, Cook Inlet, Alaska Peninsula, Aleutian Chain, Bristol Bay, Norton Sound, Kuskokwim Bay, and Kotzebue Sound, the distance from Seattle to Kotzebue in the far north being some 2,600 miles. Steamship services will be curtailed during the winter months, but in 1947 it is anticipated that services at least equal to those furnished this year will be required. Out-of-pocket losses to the Commission amounted to about $380,000 during the summer season (April-October 1946), and it is anticipated losses during the coming winter will approximate $1,630,000 based on the results of last winter's operations. These figures do not include vessel repair costs, which are very substantial in this trade.

The estimates of the Maritime Commission of the loss were not very accurate, because the total over-all cost amounted to approximately $4,000,000.

Mr. President, if we can do what is proposed, if we can all agree on the solution which was decided upon by all concerned, we can save the Government the loss, and if the Government can have the authority to charter nominally these ships to the operators, under the Commission authority, and under Commission contract, and this service can be provided for the citizens of Alaska for the 16 months suggested, we have high hope that out of that experience we can find a solution of this almost eternal Alaskan ship problem. If we do, not only will we do the residents of that great Territory a service, and dispel the yearly fears they have over the operation of ships and transportation to the Territory but in the long run we will save the Government a great deal of money.

Of course, Alaska is going to be one of the permanent military establishments of our country. Alaska is a strategic place. Alaska means a great deal to the welfare of the United States, but the transportation problem is one that has plagued the citizens of Alaska, and those of us to the south, in the States of Washington and Oregon, for many years.

The operation of American ships to Alaska is confronted with foreign competition. Prior to the war one-third of all tonnage hauled to Alaska was hauled in Canadian vessels from the port of Vancouver. During the war the United States Government built, with American money, at Prince Rupert, about midway between Seattle and Alaska, one of the finest of ports, equipped with the best facilities for handling cargo to be found on the whole North American continent. After the war that port was turned over to the Canadian Government.

Unless we can do something for American shipping, I have every reason to believe that, whereas prior to the war one-third the tonnage was hauled to Alaska in Canadian bottoms, all the tonnage will ultimately be hauled in Canadian ships to our own American Territory of Alaska.

Even now eastern suppliers to the Alaskan trade are shipping across Canada on the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railroads to the port of Prince Rupert, now owned by Canada though paid for by American money; they are shipping to that port and then on to Alaska; so it will mean the bypassing of American shipping in the territory of the distinguished Senator from Oregon and my colleague from Washington by people who have been in the business a long time. It will mean the diversion of trade from American ports. It will also mean that Americans who, during the war, used these ships and did their job as well as they knew how, will find themselves, because of that use during the war, without ships. Whereas other lines will have the opportunity to get ships and operate economically, our people will be put completely out of business. I know that no one wants that to happen.

This seems to be a good temporary solution to the problem; it may become the permanent solution. Of course, the Government ought not to operate ships any longer than necessary, but so long as an effort is being made to save money for the Government, and it is necessary, I am sure the Senate will look with favor on our proposal, if the committee headed so ably by the distinguished Senator from Maine shall see fit next week to report the measure.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I should like to add a word of emphasis, and urge the consideration by all Senators of the presentation which has just been made concerning the Alaskan shipping problem by the senior Senator from Washington, and of the supporting arguments which have come from many other western Senators, including the Senator from Oregon.

I think that all Senators from the West will recognize that the problem belongs in a real and primary sense to the West, but we likewise know and are satisfied that it has a tremendous national implication and concern. I know of few present-day problems so imperatively requiring solution. It is for that reason that I join with other Senators in suggesting further serious consideration of this subject as a national as well as a sectional problem.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I heartily endorse what the junior Senator from Washington has said of the deep national interest in this problem, and I want to add just one thing. This is a constant problem, which has at times become acute. As Alaska is without a vote in the National Congress and without representation in the Senate, it has been suggested at times that probably some of us who have a deep interest in the Territory have not done as much as we should about this matter, or that we are losing our interest in Alaska. I merely want to say for the record, at this time, that Alaska has no better advocates in the United States Senate than the Senators from the Pacific Northwest. We appreciate, we are cognizant of, the vital interest the Pacific Northwest has in Alaska, and we hope our relations will never in any way become strained. This is one of the problems needing solution, and we hope that we may be able jointly to solve it.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. In line with what the Senator is saying, as I am, I believe, the only member of the Committee on Public Lands present, may I say that, as the Senator knows, under the recent plan of reorganization the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs was combined with the Committee on Public Lands.

The Committee on Public Lands has already appointed a Subcommittee on Territories and Insular Affairs, one of whose members has just entered the Chamber, and I am sure that he will join with me in saying that the Senators from the Northwest may assure the people in their region and the people of Alaska that this committee is keenly aware of their many problems and is very anxious to do something really constructive in connection with Alaska, as well as the other Territories.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I thank the Senator.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, for the reason that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] and some of his colleagues are presently in a joint meeting in the Ways and Means Committee room and therefore are not able to be present on the floor of the Senate, the Senator from Nebraska has asked me, if it be proper for me to do so, to request that certain Senators, members of the Public Lands Committee, may b absent from the Senate next week, except on Monday. I ask, as a parliamentary inquiry, whether that is permissible?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is permissible.

Mr. CAIN. The Senators are the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Montana [Mr. ECTON], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, leaves of absence are granted as requested by the Senator from Washington.

ASSISTANCE TO SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, 2 weeks ago a group of my colleagues and I introduced Senate bill 217, a bill to make credit available to small business enterprise and to continue the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as an agency whose primary function it would be to foster and encourage small business.

Economic studies have shown that the greatest need of small business is for sources of intermediate and long-term capital. Without this assistance small business enterprises often die aborning, or are forced to the wall by the first financial crisis.

Many leading business economists advise us that we are approaching a period of recession. The trade journals and economic tipsters usually refer to it as the shake-out of 1947, and predict that it will occur this spring. They foresee declining prices in soft goods accompanied by falling production and unemployment in certain lines. They do not predict a lengthy depression, because it is generally agreed that there will be a continuing demand at high prices for hard goods. For example, even at the end of 1947 there will probably be a large backlog of orders for automobiles.

But what is significant about all these predictions is that everyone seems agreed that the people who will suffer most will be the small businessmen. Even in the case of some consumer durable goods, such as radios, it is predicted that so-called "off brands" will no longer be in demand, and that their manufacturers will be forced out of business.

Now, what is an "off brand" radio, or any other article, for that matter? Briefly, an off-brand radio, we will say, is a radio which is not made by one of the largest corporations. It is a radio made by a small businessman. It is a radio which is not advertised in the national magazines. It is not necessarily a worse radio nor is it a better radio. I have no doubt that some "off-brand" radios are far superior to the famous name radios which will be at their peak of sales. On the other hand, some may be shoddy and second rate.

In other words, then, small business will suffer merely because it is small business. It will suffer because it cannot afford the large-scale promotion which big business can afford. It will suffer because of a lack of long-term credit.

The economic history of our country shows that in the recurrent cyclical depressions it is always the small businessman who suffers. The small businessman loses his plant through foreclosure, his investments through bankruptcy. In the West it means, in addition, that the land and the buildings and plant and equipment leave the hands of local people and are foreclosed by banks and insurance companies whose headquarters are in the East. Thus depressions contribute to the concentration of wealth and economic power.

Furthermore, Mr. President, we have seen that war also contributes to the concentration of economic power. A report of the Smaller War Plants Corporation shows that during both World Wars the importance of big business rose sharply. War contracts were issued predominantly to the large concerns. They accumulated huge profits and controlled the destinies of great numbers of workers. When the Second World War came along, according to the report, "firms with 1,000 or more employees had 30 percent of the total employment in all trades and industry and 36 percent of the total pay roll. By 1943 these figures had risen to 44 and 53 percent." No less than two-thirds of the total prime contracts went to the top 100 corporations in the country, the report conclusively shows.

Mr President, the American ideal of competitive business, individual initiative, and free enterprise is facing a crisis. Unless we take steps to assist it, small business will be as extinct as the dodo.

One of the most important measures we can take to assist small business is to make it easier for small businessmen to obtain loans. A policy of liberal credit assistance for small business will do much to keep the small businessman afloat in heavy winds; by so doing it will make it possible for him to help maintain full employment and thus help to prevent economic depressions. And it will also aid in maintaining competitive enterprise.

Mr. President, we hear a great deal about the desirability of maintaining the American system of free private enterprise. It is time that we passed from the word to the deed; it is time that we actually helped small business.

Last month when we were discussing the creation of a new committee, small business had many supporters. But, as the able Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] pointed out in an eloquent speech last week, we will be better able to measure our devotion to the cause of the little man when we vote on the various bills which weigh the little man's interest against the big man's, such as the various bills which seek to give special exemptions from the antitrust laws to various industries.

This year the mandate of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation expires. The RFC was created under President Hoover to grease the wheels of industry and to maintain full production. It has done its job and it is no longer needed for that purpose. Big business has grown healthy and strong and no longer needs the assistance of RFC loans. But small business is approaching the season of its greatest need and it is a fortunate thing that this great lending agency is a device which lies ready at our hand for the purpose of assisting small business. The junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senators from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER and Mr. YOUNG], the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], and I have therefore introduced Senate bill 217, which would continue the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for a period of 5 years, subject to a mandate to assist small business.

In effect, the bill completely reconstitutes the agency on an entirely new basis. Let there be no mistake about that. I recognize that the RFC is now strongly sympathetic to the corporate giants, and lends on traditional banking criteria. Senate bill 217 attempts to change that.

The bill directs and authorizes the Federal Loan Administrator to assist competitive small business enterprise in obtaining intermediate and long-term capital on the basis of the character of the borrower, the potential contribution to the creation and maintenance of employment opportunities for those able, willing, and seeking to work, and the prospect of repayment at interest rates and other terms available to large business enterprises.

One of the greatest advantages of S. 217 is the fact that it utilizes existing institutions instead of setting up a new Government agency.

The plan advanced in the bill places its chief reliance, however, not upon any Government agency, but upon the private banks and financial institutions of the country. In order to facilitate private bank credit to private business, the bill would have the Government guarantee the loans. Let me read section 2 (b) of the bill:

> The Federal Loan Administrator shall discharge the responsibilities set forth in section 1 through—
>
> * * * * *
> (b) guaranteeing or insuring the provision of credit by private financial institutions and organizations, corporations established by State or local governments, and local private nonprofit corporations;

Only as a last resort does the bill contemplate direct loans by the RFC. Only when private banking institutions are unable fully to assist the small business enterprises in their communities does the function of making loans devolve upon the Government agency. Let me read the language of the bill in this connection:

> The Federal Loan Administrator shall discharge the responsibilities set forth in section 1—
>
> * * * * *
> (c) to the extent that such credit is needed but is not available under (b) hereof—

That is, through private banks—> providing such credit directly through his local offices.

And even when the RFC does come in, it will be noted that it does so on a completely decentralized basis. Local offices would make it possible for the small businessman to transact his business in his home locality. It would not be necessary for him to make an expensive trip to Washington to thread his way through the long corridors of our public buildings.

I am confident that hearings on this bill will be ordered at an early date, and I am further confident that as a result of these hearings, my colleagues and I on the Banking and Currency Committee will gain a fresher insight into the credit problems of the small businessman. I know that small business has no truer friend than the brilliant and courageous statesman who presides over the committee, and I know that under his chairmanship the hearings will produce many constructive suggestions.

Mr. President, let me reiterate: The bill has two very great values. First, on the positive side, it encourages small business enterprise. Secondly, by doing so it arrests the dangerous march toward concentration and monopoly which is now threatening the very basis of our economic, social, and political way of life.

The bill is now before the Committee on Banking and Currency. On behalf of my cosponsors, the Senators from Oregon, North Dakota, Vermont, Montana, and West Virginia, I invite Senators to study the bill, and to give serious thought to the problem of making credit available to small business enterprises.

In order that those who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as many thousands do, may have an opportunity to inform themselves respecting the bill, I have sent out many copies, but it was obviously impossible to distribute the bill very widely. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 217) to make credit available to small business enterprise and to continue the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the purpose of effectuating a policy of credit assistance to competitive small business enterprise was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

POLICY MANDATE TO FEDERAL LOAN ADMINISTRATOR

SECTION 1. The Federal Loan Administrator, under the direction and supervision of the President, is hereby authorized and directed to assist—

(a) competitive small business enterprises in obtaining intermediate and long-term capital on the basis of the character of the borrower, the potential contribution to the creation and maintenance of employment opportunities for those able, willing, and seeking to work, and the prospect of repayment, and at interest rates and other terms commensurate with the interest rates and other terms available to large business enterprises, but in no event at an interest rate in excess of 4 percent per annum;

(b) competitive business enterprises, large or small, in obtaining intermediate and long-term capital for the purpose of—

(1) engaging in business activities which promote competition or contribute to the elimination, prevention, or curbing of monopoly or monopolistic practices;

(2) operating, expanding, or improving plants, or parts of plants, or facilities leased or purchased under the Surplus Property Act of 1944;

(3) developing or expanding business activities in underdeveloped areas of the country;

(4) engaging in research or development activities with respect to new products, processes, techniques, or materials;

(c) corporations established by State or local government, or local private nonprofit corporations, in obtaining capital for the purpose of helping to finance local competitive business enterprises;

ANNUAL REVIEW OF NEED

SEC. 3. In the preparation of the program called for in section 1, the President shall make, or cause to be made, an annual review of the specific industries and areas in which the availability of long-term and intermediate credit would promote competition with monopoly or contribute to the elimination, prevention, or curbing of monopoly or monopolistic practices; and the Federal Loan Administrator is hereby authorized and directed to make long-term and intermediate credit available for such purposes.

AVAILABILITY OF RESOURCES OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

SEC. 4. The funds, personnel, and facilities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and its subsidiaries shall be available to the Federal Loan Administrator for the purpose of discharging the responsibilities set forth in this act, and the Administrator is hereby authorized to issue such regulations and directives to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and its subsidiaries as he may deem desirable to effectuate the purposes of this title.

ANNUAL REPORT

SEC. 5. In January of each year the Federal Loan Administrator shall submit to the President and the Congress a comprehensive report setting forth—

(a) the national need for intermediate and long-term capital under subsections (a), (b), and (c) of section 1;

(c) a full set of whatever regulations and directives have been issued by him since his previous report to Congress;

(d) such recommendations for additional legislation, including recommendations relating to the stimulation of equity capital investment in competitive business enterprises, as he may deem desirable.

(b) The first sentence of section 14 of such act, as amended, is amended by striking out "July 1, 1947" and inserting in lieu thereof "July 1, 1952."

(c) Section 5 (d) of such act, as amended, the act approved January 26, 1937 (50 Stat. 5), as amended, and the act approved February 11, 1937 (50 Stat. 19), as amended, are amended by striking out "June 30, 1947" wherever such date appears therein, and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1952."

TAX REDUCTION AND THE NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAIN in the chair). The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in order that the RECORD of this afternoon may at least be clear as to the position taken by the junior Senator from Oregon on the question of the budget, I wish to make a few remarks in regard to the budget situation as I see it.

I do not think it can be said too frequently that the Congress has a great responsibility for scrutinizing the Federal budget very carefully and squeezing out of it every single dollar of presently wasted expenditure that we can possibly eliminate from it. I think there is common agreement in the Senate that we have the responsibility of economizing in governmental expenditures. However, I believe that before we can agree upon any blanket over-all economy budget cut, be it $6,000,000,000, $4,500,000,000, or any other sum, we have the responsibility of first determining where we are to make the savings before we commit ourselves to any blanket budget cut. That, I understand, is one of the main points which the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] tried to make clear to the Senate this afternoon, and I think he did so in crystal-clear fashion. Furthermore, I think we owe that duty to the American people.

Why ignore the fact that there is a great deal of politics in this issue, and that politics are being played today over the whole tax issue? I happen to be one who believes that our public trust in the job that we hold in the Senate should dictate to us a recognition of the importance of not playing politics with the dollars of the American people. I think the Senator from Wyoming was trying to make that point clear, and I commend him for it.

Mr. President, usually I am not a prophet of pessimism, but I certainly must admit that today I am quite pessimistic about America, because I do not believe that the American people fully appreciate the great changes which have taken place in the world as a result of the devastating war from which we have just emerged.

If I wanted to play politics over the tax issue, judging from my mail, I would be in favor of a 20-percent cut, because it is only natural for people to be selfish. The human individual seems to be made that way. Further, there is a tendency for all of us to believe what we want to believe. I am afraid there is also a tendency for us not to appreciate or like an attempt on the part of anyone to force unpleasant facts upon our consciousness. I am afraid that today there are millions of American citizens who would rather not look at the picture of the world, or even look at our domestic scene. They want to believe what they want to believe; and they want to believe that in some way, somehow, we can play politics with the fiscal problems of this country and maintain economic stability.

I do not believe that, Mr. President. In fact, I believe that we are headed for some very serious economic troubles in America if we do not come to grips realistically with the whole problem of a stable currency and a reduced debt. So I am perfectly willing to take the position which I took in the Seventy-ninth Congress. It was unpopular then, too. During the summer I gathered much evidence to that effect. It was unpopular then to say to the American people, "You must tighten your belts. You must make a substantial payment on the public debt if you really want to preserve economic stability in this country, if you want to safeguard the value of the dollar, if you want to maintain the private-enterprise system."

I happen to be one who believes that the issue is just that. We, as a people—140,000,000 of us—must decide in the immediate months ahead whether the precious freedoms which we enjoy in America and the private-property economy which has lifted our standard of living above that of any other people in the world are worth saving to the degree of paying for them. I think that is the issue. Politicians in and out of the Congress can beat political tom-toms all they wish. They can appeal to the selfishness of the American taxpayer, who would like to believe that he can have a substantial reduction in his taxes now and save the value of his dollar. But I will never tarnish my record with any such false, buck-passing, deceptive play in the American arena of politics. I think our citizens must be told again and again that with the world on fire as it is this hour, if we are to preserve our system of private enterprise, we must dig down in our pockets and pay substantial taxes for the next few years until we reduce the debt so that we may escape the present danger of another depression. Such a danger will follow a few years of false economic boom produced by the war. It is as certain to follow as the day the night if we now adopt the fiscal pattern which my party foisted upon this Nation in the 1920's.

I happen to be a Republican who believes that, talk as we will, and alibi as some do, no matter what pattern of rationalization we adopt, the Republican Party cannot erase from its political record of the 1920's the chief responsibility for the depression of 1932. During that period of time we saw hourly wages in this country go up but slightly. As that great American, Harold Stassen, stated before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, by 1929 the average hourly wage in factories and plants in America was 59½ cents. Taxes went down. Comparatively speaking, as far as need and sound economics was concerned, we made a very slight payment on the national debt. But the American people were confronted with a price structure so economically unsound that installment buying went up by leaps and bounds until a tremendous economic balloon had been inflated. Then, in 1929, economic realities pricked that balloon and we had a collapse that filled our streets with the unemployed and brought economic disaster to thousands of business firms all over the country. We should have been paying on the debt at a much more rapid rate than we did in the 1920's to avoid that disaster. We should have taxed ourselves out of a substantial part of the war debt.

We should have been forthright enough as leaders of our parties to make the American people understand that they cannot have their cake and eat it too. We cannot have the great governmental services which the American people are constantly demanding—and many of which I certainly think they must have today—and not pay for them. It cannot be done. We can have those things only if we pay for them with cold dollars. There is no other source for those public service payments than the pockets of the American taxpayers. I have noticed that most citizens wish savings made on the other fellow's governmental services but they do not want to sacrifice services which they think they should receive from their Government.

I think we have got to come to grips with this problem. We must make up our minds what services we can dispense with and tell the American people so. We ought to do it, Mr. President, before we use the strategy which is now being used of having Members of Congress commit themselves on a blanket budget reduction when they have not the slightest idea of what is encompassed by that reduction. We should first be told where it is to be made, and what services are to be dispensed with. I cannot be a party to such action as is being proposed by the joint budget committee. I do not think it is fair dealing with the American people.

As I said on the floor the other day, Mr. President—and it must be repeated again many, many times—not only have we the obligation of paying on the national debt so that we can make secure this system that we call the private enterprise system, but the only way it can be made secure and kept so is to have a stable currency.

Do not forget, Mr. President, that we cannot keep that system secure if a trend is started whereby the number of people who have nothing to lose from a change in our economic system is constantly increased. In my judgment, that is a statement of principle involving a combination of sociological and political facts which both our major political parties must keep in mind in the critical years immediately ahead. If we are plummeted into the depths of another depression we shall increase by millions those who will then become fertile minds for the propaganda that they have nothing to lose by a change in our form of economy. Mr. President, I think Senators know me well enough to be sure that then as now, I shall be heard talking and fighting for the economic system which we have, because I know of no other that can give to the individual the dignity and the rights which he enjoys in America today under our private property economy with its partner, a political democracy. But I am afraid that we shall talk to many deaf ears if we now adopt a budgetary policy which will again lay the groundwork for the great mistakes which we made in the twenties.

I wish I could say that my party has learned something from the experience of the 1920's. A great many of its leaders have but many have not. I am satisfied that the great rank and file of Republican voters in this country have learned from the mistakes of the Republican Party in the 1920's and they do not want those mistakes repeated. That is why I have said on public platforms in this country and in this Chamber, and will say again, that I think the approach which is being made to the fiscal problems of this Government at the present time by my party as represented by some of its spokesmen in the Congress of the United States is not in step with the thinking of the great majority of Republican voters. I think they understand that we cannot have our cake and eat it, too. We cannot have a huge national debt and a sound dollar for very long. The voters see that tax reduction at the cost of a cheapened dollar is no tax reduction at all. I think what they want is the strictest type of economy in the administration of our Government, to the end of eliminating every wasteful expenditure. I favor that. I think they want a substantial payment on the national debt. I favor that. I have heard no proposal for a cut in the budget that would justify our not taking the entire cut, if we can make it, and applying it on the national debt.

I think it is a great economic fallacy to argue that the present tax structure is an impediment to production. Oh, I know that there are selfish business interests which are making that argument. It is only natural that businessmen should want to make more if they can. But as I said earlier this afternoon, after all, the profits which businessmen are presently making are being made as the result of a wartime dislocation. They are profiting today out of the war itself, as they did during every day of the war. Millions of our people will continue to profit for some years after the war because a considerable period of time will be required to readjust ourselves to a peacetime economy.

I do not believe that a single dollar of the war profits now collected under our present tax structure should be returned to them by a tax reduction. I think they ought to thank their God that they live in a country giving to them the economic advantages and opportunities which ours gives to them to make the profits which they are making. They ought to welcome the opportunity to repay into the Treasury of the United States such a fair share of their profits as are collected from them by way of taxation.

Mr. President, I have talked quite frankly to a number of businessmen. A couple of weeks ago I went back to my own State, and from Tuesday noon until Saturday night I made 13 speeches in my State. I talked to many business groups and told them quite frankly and, in some speeches, in these words:

> Gentlemen, count me out on any program to reduce taxes in this session of Congress, because I think I serve you best when I tell you that whatever economies we can effectuate in the national budget should go toward payments on the national debt.

I do not mean to imply, Mr. President, that I convinced them all. I want to say to their credit that by the score businessmen in my State told me, as I went over the State: "You are right. Do what you can to help get some economy in the budget, and then apply the savings to the national debt, and we will go along with you."

That is why I said earlier this afternoon that I did not think any Member of Congress was justified in rising on the floor of either the Senate or the House of Representatives and saying with assurance that there is any mandate in connection with the tax-reduction issue. I do not know what businessmen as a whole, workers as a whole, or farmers as a class would say in a referendum on that issue if all the facts were presented to them, but I think it is my obligation as a Member of the Senate of the United States to consider all the economic facts and to reach an honest, independent judgment as to what is best for the economic future of my country, and then vote accordingly. It is my duty to cast such a vote, even if an overwhelming majority of the American people think I should vote the other way. That happens to be a conviction of mine as to what the responsibility of a Member of the Senate is, because I do not share the notion that I should vote in accordance with pressure politics. All of us have seen American public opinion changed overnight, once it came to understand the real issues at stake in a problem. My confidence in the long-time judgment of the American voters is so deep that I believe I can hear them saying to me by the millions, "Vote what you think the facts on this fiscal policy dictate."

Furthermore, Mr. President, I think that in the months immediately ahead the American people are concerned, and will become more greatly concerned, about the entire problem of national defense and its relationship to the budget. Until I have heard the evidence I simply am not going to vote for any proposal which would automatically and by way of prejudgment say that we should squeeze out of the defense budget of the United States any sum of dollars. I think the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] made perfectly clear earlier today that our Budget Committee does not know what the evidence is that justifies a reduction in the national-defense budget. Yet it is telling the Nation today, I understand, that a certain sum of billions of dollars should be taken from that budget, without the slightest conception, apparently, of what effect that will have on national security.

Mr. President, I think the issue is rather simple. Either we shall keep America strong and in a position to enforce the peace and the objectives of the San Francisco Conference until such time as the members of the United Nations accustom themselves to the habits of peace, or else we shall have war in another quarter of a century. I am satisfied that is inevitably true.

Mr. President, I am not even sure that Hitler did not win this war. When we look at the intolerance in Europe and here at home, when we look at the development of totalitarianism since VJ-day in various parts of the world, when we take into account the fact that today we are practically surrounded by police states—and, as I have said before, I do not care what label is put upon them, whether they are called Fascist or Communist, the fact is that they are police states in which the individual's liberty and dignity are subordinated to the will of the dictator of the state—I say that no honest realist can look at that type of world and can reach a conclusion that we have won either the war or the peace. Mr. President, they have yet to be won. The peace will not be won by a soft America, by a weak America, by an America that breaks faith with those who made the great sacrifice in this war in the belief that they were fighting to put an end to that type of intolerance and bigotry which gave cause to the war, the type of totalitarianism that runs roughshod over the weak and sacrifices the rights of the individual.

That is why, as a progressive and liberal Republican, Mr. President, I take the position that the best way to preserve the American system for our future generations is for us to remain strong. Certainly the burden of proof is on the budget-cutters to come forward with the specific details of the proposed slashes into the defense budget, before I shall go along with any of those slashes. Certainly I am not going to prejudge or commit myself in advance as to any so-called fixed-sum reduction which the present strategy is seeking to foist upon us.

Mr. President, you know as well as I do how it will work. It will be said—in fact, it was said this afternoon—"It is not binding and final; we can change it." But let us not be naive about it. We also know that once that type of commitment is made, it will be argued, "After all, we agreed to cut so many billions of dollars. Having agreed to do that, we cannot go back on that agreement, for the American people have come to rely upon it. We certainly do not want to put ourselves in such a position that it can be said that we agreed to one thing one month, and then the next month we are of a different mind." Mr. President, you know all the rest of the rationalized arguments that will be used.

The time to stop that strategy is now. The time has come for us to make very clear to those who are seeking to make their recommendations on the Budget cuts that on the issue of national security the burden of proof is upon them. I want to know just where they are proposing to make cuts. Are they going to make the cuts in the funds for our occupation forces in Europe? To our everlasting shame as a nation we have already cut our funds for use over there to such a point that we are not fulfilling the obligations we should fulfill if we mean to win the peace in Europe. I am not going to sell America short. I am not going to sell national defense short. I am not going to play politics with the security of my Nation. So far as I am concerned, I am not going to make a political appeal to the selfishness of the American taxpayer, in trying to make him think that it is in his interest that we give him a substantial tax reduction at this time.

I want to reduce taxes just so soon as we can do so with safety to our economy; but I tell you, Mr. President, that I am going to start with the reduction of taxes in the lower-income groups. I am not going to favor the type of tax reduction which I have heard discussed and proposed by some of the leaders of my party, which would accomplish only one thing, namely, make the rich richer and the poor poorer. When I stand for tax reduction, Mr. President, I shall do so on the basis of ability to pay. I shall urge that when we make our first tax reductions, we make them for the bracket of our population least able to pay. Something tells me that there is going to be much sympathy for that point of view among that great mass of our people who are always conscious of the fact, as Lincoln tried to make our party conscious of the fact years ago, when he pointed out that, after all, one of the objectives of government is to promote the greatest good for the greatest number.

I am sorry to take this much time, Mr. President, and I would not do it if it were not for the fact that I think today there is a great split in the Republican Party across the Nation in regard to what the fiscal program of the Government should be. I am sorry it has developed, but I shall not run away from it. I think those of us within the Republican Party who believe that the fiscal program that is being proposed by some of our leaders is good for neither the party nor for the country are exercising and exhibiting the greatest possible loyalty to the Republican Party when we take issue with our leaders on this issue of tax reduction. I intend to continue to take issue on it because I think it is of critical importance to the security of this Nation—economically, politically, and militarily.

I think it is well that we do it now, because if that becomes an issue in 1948, the American people will decide it in a manner which I am convinced will not maintain the Republican Party in power, and if we follow this unsound fiscal course proposed by the Republicans who favor a 20-percent tax reduction, that should be the answer of the American people.

INVESTIGATION OF MONOPOLIES AND MONOPOLISTIC PRACTICES

So much for taxes, Mr. President. Now for a few minutes I wish to comment on a resolution which I really rose to discuss. I refer to a resolution I am submitting today in behalf of myself and Senators AIKEN, LANGER, YOUNG, MURRAY, TAYLOR, and KILGORE. It is quite apropos that I presented the resolution following the excellent speech made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR]. I was not aware that he was going to discuss the monopoly problem which confronts this country, but my resolution, of which he is one of the sponsors, is directly on that point.

It proposes that the Committee on the Judiciary investigate monopoly and monopolistic practices. I feel that unless Congress makes a full study of the monopoly problem America may awaken one day to find that free competitive enterprise and our cherished political institutions are only an empty shell, and that the heart of the American system has been eaten away by the cancerous growth of monopoly and concentration of private economic power.

The sponsors of this resolution are not asking for a witch hunt of any kind. We want to see the United States Senate conduct a sober, objective, and comprehensive investigation, which will leave no aspect of the problem unconsidered. Above all, we do not want a long, drawn-out series of studies and reports that lead nowhere. We want legislative action to give the Nation a consistent and coordinated antimonopoly program, and we want it soon. We believe that there is not too much time left. We are convinced that the American people are not aware of the tremendous rise of monopolistic power during the war years, that they are not aware of the fact that one of the tremendous costs of the war to the economy of America was the greatest concentration of financial power in the hands of a few that has been known in all our history. It has to be broken up.

We hear much about small business, the demands of small business to protection from this or that. I am in favor of protecting small business. Since I have been a Member of the Senate, I have demonstrated a record of cooperating at all times in an endeavor to gain for small business its just rights, but, in my judgment, the best protection we can give to the small businessman is freeing him from the control of monopoly.

Speaking generally, by and large, small businessmen as a group are not the independent entrepreneurs they think they are. They like to think of themselves as men of independent business judgment, but to a marked degree they are the workers for American monopoly as their employers.

If we are to give them the true rights which should accrue to them under a private-property system, then we must take off of them the shackles of monopolistic control. That is why we think this resolution we are submitting today should be speedily effectuated. I am sure that the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, of which I am not a member, but in whose members I have complete confidence, would conduct the type of investigation which needs to be conducted if the Senate will authorize it by the resolution which I offer.

As the Senator from Idaho in his speech stated, earlier this year we reintroduced a revised antimonopoly bill. In the main it is practically the same bill we introduced in the Seventy-ninth Congress. It is a bill which already has aroused a great deal of discussion and debate, and I may also say, much opposition. But the opposition is coming primarily from the sources from which we expected it to come. It is coming from those sources which have much to gain from a continuation of the monopolistic practices, which are reaping such great profits at such great cost to the American people.

The bill, Mr. President, contains provision for a consistent and coordinated antimonopoly program and a prohibition of American participation in international cartels. I digress for a moment to say that I know of nothing, other than keeping ourselves nationally strong, which will do more to prevent another war than to outlaw once and for all, and permanently, international economic cartels. I deny that any American business combination has any right whatsoever to enter into economic treaties with powerful business concerns abroad, which history shows inevitably lead to economic war and eventually to military war. I say I deny that right. I take the position that we as a government have not only the right but the duty to say to American business, "You shall not enter into such economic business cartels save and except in accordance with the rules and regulations laid down by the Congress of the United States and administered by the State Department."

If we are to have peace, Mr. President, we shall have to pay for it, and I think one of the prices of peace—and we certainly should be willing to pay for it gladly—is the outlawing of international cartels. That is what our bill proposes to do.

It is said that outlawing international cartels is an assault on the private property enterprise system. It is no such thing. It is a denial to American business monopolies of the right to enter into trade arrangements which are bound to have international economic repercussions, and place us in such a position time and time again, as has been true in the past, that the American flag has to be carried to protect rights which we as a government had nothing to do about vesting in the first instance. I say that before our flag is carried forward in the future to any foreign soil to give protection to any economic rights arising out of an international economic cartel, we must determine in the first instance, through government, whether those rights shall vest.

The bill also has provisions in it for eliminating discriminatory freight rates and preventing or eliminating monopolistic practices with respect to patents. That is a beautiful subject, too, Mr. President. Time does not permit a discussion of it here this afternoon, but in a later discourse I will discuss it. There is need for a thorough overhauling of the patent system of this country. The bill provides further for credit assistance for the small and competitive business enterprises, more adequate and integrated enforcement of the antitrust acts, control of mergers, and, where necessary, effective public control of monopoly and monopolistic practices.

The sponsors of the bill have been endeavoring since we introduced it in the Seventy-ninth Congress to get an objective analysis from the various governmental agencies concerned, of the strengths and the weaknesses of the bill. Let me make this point perfectly clear, Mr. President: We do not claim that this bill is in its final draft. The subject is so complex and so complicated that no group of men in the Senate, in my judgment, can sit down as we did and draft a perfect antimonopoly bill. However, we felt it was important to do the best preliminary job that we could and come forward with the results of our labor; then, through hearings and by way of amendments, to modify the bill in accordance with the evidence that may be advanced during its consideration.

As the author of the bill I stand, as I am sure its cosponsors stand, ready and willing to modify it in any particular whenever a modification can be justified and supported by the evidence advanced in its interest. But we do say, Mr. President, that here is the starting point. We feel that such an investigation as we are calling for today will give us additional information that will be of great help to us in further perfecting the bill, and we are greatly indebted to various agencies of Government that have replied to a letter which we sent to them asking for their analysis and criticisms of the bill.

I shall not take time to read all the suggestions that have been made to us, but for the purposes of the RECORD, I desire to give a sample of two.

The Budget Bureau, for example, sums up its general position on the bill as follows:

> Comprehensive legislation for control of monopoly and monopolistic practices is required. S. 72—

Which is our bill—

> takes several important steps in developing a more effective program for this purpose. Many of the suggested amendments would help to make it even more effective.

Some of which, may I say by way of digression, Mr. President, have been added to the revised bill which we introduced at the beginning of this session of Congress.

The Budget Bureau also refers in specific terms to the provision of the bill directing the President to formulate an over-all antimonopoly program.

> This title—

States the Budget Bureau—

> would help the President in coordinating an aggressive attack on the problem of economic concentration.

The Budget Bureau also comments favorably upon the title authorizing the President to make a regular review of all Federal regulatory activities and issue directives, where necessary, to curtail or correct Federal policies not adequately protecting the public interest against monopolies or monopolistic practices.

Other agency comments—and I summarized a few of them—are as follows:

With respect to the prohibition of cartels, to which I have already referred, the Attorney General reacts favorably to the bill's prohibition of international cartels, and suggests that civil as well as criminal penalties be provided to help enforce the prohibition.

The State Department supports the general purposes of the provisions of the bill prohibiting international cartels. A number of detailed amendments are suggested in order to improve this provision.

The Secretary of the Treasury expresses the view that specific prohibition of American participation in international cartels would help strengthen our hand in foreign negotiations.

As to patent provisions of the bill, the State Department favors the requirement for filing patent agreements with the United States Patent Office. It believes this provision will strengthen the position of United States representatives in international negotiations to revise the International Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property and will also aid the Government in carrying out the obligations to be undertaken under the proposed International Trade Organization.

The Attorney General endorses these proposals, but suggests modifications in certain penalties provided, and also asks that the bill require that duplicate copies of patent agreements be filed for transmittal to the Attorney General.

The bill contains a provision for loans to small business through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I happen to be one who believes that the RFC is not doing all that it should do in the interests of the general welfare of small business concerns. We have written into the bill a provision which seeks to give them loans through the RFC, with certain specific instructions to the RFC in regard to the making of such loans.

The basic principles of the provision for the small business loans by the RFC are regarded by the Budget Bureau as consistent with the policy and statements contained in the President's recent messages to Congress.

The Acting Federal Loan Administrator suggests several changes in the title, which the sponsors have under consideration.

Then there is a section on control of mergers. The Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission indicates that the bill's provision as to the control of mergers, which remedies a basic defect in section 7 of the Clayton Act, would be one of the most effective methods of restraining the growth of excessive concentration of economic power.

Thus, I could go through one letter after another and read comments which we have received from responsible Government officials charged with duties in connection with the regulation of American business. The sum and substance of it all is, I think, that by and large they feel that the bill, even in its present form, would be a constructive contribution in solving the problem of controlling monopoly and monopolistic practices.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks the communications I have received in relation to the antimonopoly bill from the Bureau of the Budget, the Departments of State, Treasury, Justice, and Commerce, and from the Federal Farm Agency, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Federal Trade Commission.

In closing my remarks, Mr. President, I want to say that I am in this fight for control and regulation of monopolies to the finish. I am in this fight on that issue so long as the people of my State give me the privilege and the trust of serving them in this body. I am in this fight against monopolies and monopolistic practices because I know of nothing in America today that so threatens the continuation of our private-property enterprise system as the tremendous concentration of wealth in monopolies, which is now strangling any hope of the small businessman really to breathe freely the fresh air of a private-enterprise system.

There being no objection, the communications were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
BUREAU OF THE BUDGET,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1947.

Hon. WAYNE MORSE,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MORSE: Following your letter of August 1 requesting comments on the proposed antimonopoly bill (S. 2482), I requested the views of the various agencies primarily concerned in this broad program. Detailed comments and suggestions have now been received from the State Department, the Commerce Department, the Federal Loan Agency, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Treasury Department, the Justice Department, and the Federal Trade Commission. Copies of these letters are attached.

Your letter of January 17 requesting comments on the revised bill (S. 72) arrived just as I was preparing to transmit the comments on the earlier version. Since most of the views expressed by the agencies apply equally to the new version, it seems best not to delay my answer any longer.

In reply to both letters, I am enclosing a memorandum prepared by members of my staff discussing various aspects of the proposed legislation. I trust these comments will be of use to you.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES E. WEBB,
Director.

BUREAU OF THE BUDGET SUMMARY AND COMMENTS ON S. 2482, SEVENTY-NINTH CONGRESS, AND S. 72, EIGHTIETH CONGRESS

Title I of both bills authorizes and directs the President to formulate an over-all antimonopoly program, to make annual studies and reports on existing conditions and projected programs, and to submit any reorganization plans necessary to effective administration of the antimonopoly program. The Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission questions the desirability of removing the provision in the Reorganization Act of 1945, prohibiting transfers of functions from the Federal Trade Commission. He suggests that, since the Commission is already "the nucleus of a coordinated and consistent antimonopoly program," the responsibility for protecting the public interest in the field of monopoly should be concentrated largely in it.

This title would help the President in coordinating an aggressive attack on the problem of economic concentration. The exemption of the Federal Trade Commission from the President's reorganization powers is not believed to be in accord with the President's program to assure maximum effectiveness in the administration of the antimonopoly program.

Title II prohibits participation of American business in international cartels, but permits compliance with international commodity agreements officially entered into by the Government of the United States. The Secretary of State supports the general purposes of the title, but suggests that in its present form it might limit the scope of international negotiations now under way on such topics as international cartels and commodity agreements and the relationship between state trading and private trading. To meet these objections, and to clarify certain ambiguities, he makes numerous detailed suggestions. The Acting Secretary of the Treasury expresses the view that specific prohibition of American participation in international cartels would help strengthen our hand in foreign negotiations. The Attorney General suggests that civil as well as criminal penalties be provided to help enforce the proposed prohibition on agreements between American and foreign business enterprises if the purpose or effect of such agreements is to control production, distribution, markets, use of patents, inventions, or other technology. The general problem of international cartels and restrictive practices is becoming increasingly urgent; it will require much further study.

Title III requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to establish a uniform classification of property and a uniform scale of freight rates in order to encourage development of competitive enterprise in all regions of continental United States. Commissioner Splawn, in behalf of the Commission's legislative committee, suggests the omission of this title from the bill on the grounds that the Commission is already taking action to remedy inequities, that the requirements of the bill are too inflexible and vague, and that the bill applies only to railroads and not to competing carriers. The Attorney General points out that less than 5 percent of the total volume of carload freight now moves under the class rates which would be equalized by this title; he suggests that the bill be amended to include the principle of equalization among the standards to be applied by the Commission in determining the lawfulness of commodity and exception rates applied in lieu of class rates. In view of the considerations advanced by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the 1940 revisions in the statutes designed to meet these problems, and the cases now before the Supreme Court, further consideration of the desirability of including this title in the bill would be justified. Experience argues strongly against such specific prescription of rate-making standards in a legislative enactment.

Title IV amends the Clayton Antitrust Act to permit the Attorney General to intervene in patent suits, to require filing of all patent assignments and agreements with the United States Patent Office, and to declare illegal any patent licensing agreements which limit production, control prices or otherwise further monopolistic purposes. The Secretary of State expresses the view that the filing requirements will strengthen the position of United States representatives in international negotiations to revise the International Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property, and will also aid the Government in carrying out the obligations to be undertaken under the proposed International Trade Organization. The Attorney General endorses these proposals, but suggests modification in certain penalties provided, and also asks that the bill require that duplicate copies of patent agreements be filed for transmittal to the Attorney General. The Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission likewise supports this title, but proposes that these agreements be filed with the Commission, as previously suggested by the Temporary National Economic Committee. On this minor point the legislation perhaps should be made flexible by permitting the President to designate the agency to serve as repository for these agreements and obviate the necessity for duplicate files.

Title V authorizes and directs the Federal Loan Administrator to use all the funds and facilities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make intermediate and long-term capital available to competitive small-business enterprises, wherever possible, through guaranties of private credit, on terms commensurate with those available to large enterprises (with interest in no event in excess of 4 percent), as well as to all competitive business enterprises, and State and local corporations financing local competitive enterprises. It also requires the President to make an annual review of industries and areas where availability of credit would promote competition, and requires the Federal Loan Administrator to submit comprehensive annual progress reports and recommendations to the President and the Congress. The Acting Federal Loan Administrator questions the need for additional legislation on the ground that it would largely duplicate existing authority; in the event that title V is retained, he suggests several changes. The basic principles of this title appear consistent with the policy statements contained in the President's recent messages to the Congress. The substantive changes proposed should, however, be given careful consideration. In the interest of consistency in policy and to avoid duplication, the provisions of this title should be coordinated with the new charter which will shortly be proposed for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Title VI authorizes annual appropriations of $6,000,000 to both the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission. Since at present appropriations for these two programs are not limited by specific authorization, the necessity or desirability of the proposed authorizations of annual appropriations of $6,000,000 each is not apparent. In general, indefinite authorizations are preferable for continuing operations. Fixed authorizations in some future year might unduly limit necessary activities.

Title VII of the new bill incorporates the recommendation of the President made in his economic report to the Congress to prohibit all future mergers or acquisitions of corporate units—whether through purchase of stock or through acquisition of assets—whose effect is to lessen competition to the detriment of the public interest. The Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission in his comments on the earlier bill points out the need for correcting the basic defects of section 7 of the Clayton Act and refers to the Commission's numerous previous recommendations for passage of legislation similar to the new title VII. Such a provision would be one of the most effective methods of restraining the growth of excessive concentration of economic power. The provisions of the title requiring advance review by the Commission on proposed mergers and acquisitions are perhaps debatable. The disadvantage of conferring immunity against later Government action under section 7, however, may be offset by the advantage of providing a mechanism for preventive action and by the additional assurance to the parties involved on the legality of the proposed merger.

Title VIII (title VII of S. 2482) provides that, in any antitrust cases at the request of the Attorney General, the court may utilize the Federal Trade Commission as master in chancery to formulate a decree or may refer entire proceedings to the Commission to take evidence, make findings of facts, and draft conclusions of law. It would also authorize the Commission to investigate cases in which State and local laws may interfere with the free flow of interstate commerce. The Attorney General suggests that representatives of the political unit enacting the challenged law be permitted to introduce evidence at the Commission's hearings. The Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission points out that the court can now utilize the Commission as master in chancery for formulation of decrees without any request from the Attorney General. The Chairman objects to the unlimited court review of the findings of the Commission in other cases referred to it, on the grounds that it would unduly abridge the Commission's administrative powers. He suggests instead a more extensive use of the Commission's remedial functions subject only to limited judicial review. This suggestion involves the important principle of the relation of a court to its own master in chancery, and hence will require careful study.

Title IX (title VIII of S. 2482) would authorize and direct the President to make a regular review of all Federal regulatory activities and issue directives where necessary to curtail or correct policies not adequately protecting the public interest against monopolies or monopolistic activities. Where monopoly or monopolistic practice is not yet subject to effective public control, the President is directed to submit to the Congress a specific program to protect the public interest "through some form of effective public control." The Attorney General points out that "public control" is defined as "any form of regulation or ownership of business enterprise," and suggests that this title be amended to indicate clearly that public ownership should be recommended only if the President determines no other form of control is adequate.

The Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission endorses the general objectives of title IX, but enters into a discussion regarding the propriety of the effect of this title and of section 104 (a) in making the Commission directly responsible to the President. The Commission's objections in this respect do not appear to have such validity as would justify the elimination of these provisions from the bill.

Comprehensive legislation for control of monopoly and monopolistic practices is required. S. 72 takes several important steps in developing a more effective program for this purpose. Many of the suggested amendments would help to make it even more effective.

JANUARY 31, 1947.

The Honorable WAYNE MORSE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR MORSE: This letter is in further reply to your communication of August 1, 1946, transmitting a copy of S. 2482, antimonopoly bill of 1947, and requesting the comments of the Department of State on this proposed measure. An examination of the bill leads me to conclude that the major interest of the Department of State relates to title II—Prohibition of American participation in international cartels. My suggestions will, therefore, be related primarily to this section.

I should like, however, to make a general comment in support of the purposes behind the bill which I infer from section 1 and from your explanatory remarks in the Senate on July 26, 1946. Congressional enactment of a measure designed to strengthen and clarify antitrust legislation and to encourage the growth within the United States of independent competitive business enterprises would underline the determination of this Government to sustain a free enterprise system at home and to prevent the participation of American firms in restrictive trade practices abroad.

As you know, the executive branch of the Government, through the interdepartmental Executive Committee on Economic Foreign Policy and its related subcommittees, for the past several years has examined the problems of eliminating restrictions on international trade. Its suggested program took form in November 1945 in the publication of the United States proposals for the expansion of world trade and employment, with which you are no doubt familiar. It was proposed that an international trade organization be established to promote multilateral trade and to eliminate restrictions on such trade. On July 19, 1946, the ECEFP approved a United States draft of a charter for the proposed organization, which was subsequently made available to the general public. In October 1946, a meeting of experts from 17 nations was held in London where the form of a proposed international trade organization was discussed and a large measure of agreement secured on the text of a Charter of such an organization; by and large, the draft charter drawn up by the United States was closely followed. I enclose a copy of the document setting out the agreements reached in London. I invite your attention particularly to chapter VI of the draft, which deals with restrictive business practices. According to present plans, a further conference of experts will be held in Geneva in April where the few remaining differences will be ironed out. It is hoped that a final conference creating an international trade organization will be held some time late in the year. It is planned that the charter of the proposed organization will be submitted to the Congress for approval after its formulation by the world conference.

In view of the current stage of negotiations for the establishment of the international organization indicated above, you may wish to consider the relationship of that portion of your bill prohibiting participation by United States nationals in international cartels to the forthcoming international trade conference. The present draft Charter contemplates international commodity agreements of various types, but this provision of the Charter, like all the others, may be affected by the give and take of international negotiation. If the Congress should enact the substance of title II of your bill during the course of international considerations of these problems, such legislation would obviously affect the nature of the negotiations which this Government's representatives could undertake on this subject.

Another factor which you may wish to consider in connection with the enactment of title II is the recent expansion of state trading in many parts of the world. It is not yet clear how private trading and state trading can best be made to operate side by side in the international field. Again, the content of title II may determine how far the United States can go in international agreements looking to a modus vivendi between state and private trading.

As long as international negotiations are in progress, it is possible that the Department's policy may be altered to meet changing conditions. However, on the basis of the Department's current understanding of these and related problems, I have a number of suggestions to make regarding title II of your bill.

I would suggest that the heading of title II, "International cartels," be changed to "International restrictive business practices," Although this suggestion may appear to be largely a question of semantics, it may avoid future ambiguities in judicial interpretations of jurisdiction. The Department has taken the position that its primary concern is with the effects of international industrial organization, not with its form. As you know, a cartel is but one of the many mechanisms through which business enterprises may restrict the development of international trade. Another form is the international corporate combine. Still another is unilateral policing of an entire industry by a single firm through exclusive control of raw materials of processing facilities. It is the position of the Department that any practices of commercial enterprises which have the purpose or effect of restricting international trade should be eliminated regardless of the form they take. I should like to see the title of the section such as to avoid the chances of a limiting judicial construction.

I believe it would be desirable to make clear that the phrase "business enterprises" (line 3, p. 5) includes an enterprise owned in whole or in part by a government. In negotiations leading up to the international trade conference the United States is taking the position that such enterprises should be subject to the same prohibitions relative to restrictive practices in international trade as are those enterprises controlled by nongovernmental interests. If there is congressional enactment on this subject in the near future, I should like to see such enactment support the position presently taken by the executive branch of the Government relative to these problems. This suggestion could be implemented by altering the definition of business enterprise in the section relating to definitions by adding the following words at the end of section 901 (c):

"As used in title II 'business enterprise' shall mean all persons and entities conducting business including such entities which are agencies of government or in which there is a Government interest."

An alternative to this method would be to invert the phrase "no private person or business enterprise" (line 3, p. 5) to read "no business enterprise or private persons." This would reduce the danger that the word "private" might be interpreted as modifying "business enterprise" as well as "person."

I would like to suggest that the phrase "agreement or understanding with business enterprises of other nations" be amended to read "combination, agreement, or other arrangement with commercial enterprises or private persons of other nations." This wording would more nearly parallel that contained in the draft charter. It would have the further advantage of including within the jurisdiction of this section certain intercorporate relations which might not be covered by the words "agreements" or "understanding.".

Another method for insuring that the bill have jurisdiction over intercorporate relationships as well as agreements among enterprises lies in an expansion of the relief provisions of section 202. I would suggest the inclusion in section 202 of all the relief provisions of the antitrust laws, particularly the right of divestiture. The use of divestiture to gain relief from monopolistic arrangements in international trade could only be applied to intercorporate relationships. Thus the congressional intent to include such relationships under the jurisdiction of the bill would be clear.

The extension of prohibitions against agreements to those which have the purpose or effect of restricting or controlling the "use of patents, inventions, or other technology" (line 6, page 6) is open to question. I should suggest the elimination from title II of reference to patents, inventions, and technology. As the bill stands, a reading of title II in conjunction with title IV makes it clear that patents may not be used as a mechanism to limit production, fix prices, or allocate market territory beyond the scope authorized in the patent itself. Thus the reference to this subject in title II is unnecessary, and its inclusion in title II might call into question a large area of patent agreements which heretofore have been considered legitimate and which would continue to be so considered under title IV of your bill.

The proviso permitting United States citizens to comply with the requirements of international commodity agreements entered into by the Government of the United States should, I believe, be broadened to permit compliance by United States nationals with any international agreement officially entered into by the United States Government. Certain agreements requiring compliance by United States commercial firms might not be considered "commodity" agreements, and American business enterprises should be protected in these fields as well as in those covered by commodity agreements.

I have a few suggestions relative to portions of the bill other than title II. In section 1, I would suggest that the development of foreign commerce as well as interstate commerce be included as one of the purposes. This would require the insertion of the words "and foreign" in line 1, page 2, immediately before the word "commerce."

I have the following comment relative to Title IV—Preventing or eliminating monopolistic practices with respect to patents. This section appears to codify and regularize existing judicial interpretations of the patent and antitrust statutes, insofar as they are interrelated. It therefore has the merit of simplifying the presentation of American policy on this subject to foreign nations. Moreover, I believe that the provisions for the filing of patent assignments, licenses, and related agreements will strengthen the position of the United States representative at negotiations which are contemplated for revisions of the International Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property. In my opinion, these provisions will also aid the United States Government in carrying out some of the obligations that it may undertake through membership in the proposed International Trade Organization. However, since this section of the bill is concerned with a complicated legal subject and affects primarily the domestic economy, I will refrain from further detailed comments and defer to the opinions of the Commissioner of Patents and the Attorney General.

Thank you for the opportunity to comment upon the bill. You may be assured that the Department of State will be glad to supply any further technical assistance desired by you or the committee which will consider this bill.

The Department has been informed by the Bureau of the Budget that, while there is no objection to the submission of this report, the Director of the Bureau has sent you copies of proposed reports which he had received from this Department and other departments and agencies.

Sincerely yours,

W. L. CLAYTON,
Under Secretary for Economic Affairs.

OCTOBER 7, 1946.

DIRECTOR, BUREAU OF THE BUDGET.

DEAR SIR: By your letter of August 29, transmitting a copy of a letter from Senator MORSE, dated August 1, 1946, you invited the comments of this Department on S. 2482, a bill introduced by eight Senators designed to curb monopolies and monopolistic practices.

The specific provisions of the bill affect the responsibilities of the Treasury Department only incidentally. However, the general purposes of the bill have an important relationship to the reconversion of the American economy and its healthy development. I shall therefore take the liberty of making some general observations on the bill, despite the fact that the primary responsibility for the administration of such legislation would lie elsewhere.

This Government has been committed for half a century to the protection of competitive enterprise against monopolies and restraints of trade. Despite the fact that the Sherman antitrust law has been on the statute books since 1890, and has been supplemented from time to time by other legislation directed to the same ends, it remains the general impression with the American public that the concentration of economic power and the concomitant restriction of the field of free competitive enterprise has continued to develop despite all governmental efforts to hold it within bounds. It seems to me peculiarly important that at a time when we look forward to a great expansion of American productivity we should reexamine the effectiveness of our antimonopoly measures and be prepared to adopt new techniques, if necessary, to accomplish the aims sought. The price rigidity, production limitation, and stratification of distribution channels, characteristic of monopoly, would, in my judgment, seriously hamper the attainment of full production and employment which we hope to achieve.

S. 2482 is a comprehensive measure aimed at attacking the monopoly problem from many viewpoints. Title I requires an annual report by the President on the extent of monopoly and plans for its restriction, presumably based on studies of the Council of Economic Advisers. Titles IV, VI, and VII are designed to strengthen the enforcement of the antitrust laws by making new procedures available and by increasing the penalties for violations. These titles affect directly the work of the Department of Justice and of the Federal Trade Commission, and I shall therefore make no specific comments thereon. Titles III and V propose to assist the development of small and competitive enterprises by, respectively, eliminating discriminatory freight rates and providing capital financing. While the matters in question fall directly within the field of activity of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Loan Agency, and the Department of Commerce, I venture to suggest that because of the novelty of the proposals made as an antimonopoly measure, consideration might be given to referring the proposals at this time to the Council of Economic Advisers for their consideration.

The provisions of title II, prohibiting American participation in international cartels, are of somewhat more direct interest to this Department because of the work of the Foreign Funds Control in dealing with problems involving the relationship of American and enemy enterprises, and because of participation by this Department in the formulation of American proposals for an International Trade Organization which seek by international agreement to outlaw cartels and other restrictive business practices. While the provisions of title II are more in the nature of a clarification and particularization of the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law insofar as they affect our foreign commerce, rather than an extension of the law, I am inclined to the view that a specific prohibition on American participation in international cartels at this time would lend considerable strength to our position in an international convention where we seek acquiescence of the other countries of the world in a similar program. The specific language of the bill is no doubt being reviewed by the Department of Justice, and I would prefer not to express an opinion on that score.

Very truly yours,

O. MAX GARDNER,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

DECEMBER 23, 1946

Hon. JAMES E. WEBB,
Director, Bureau of the Budget,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WEBB: In compliance with the provisions of Bureau of the Budget circular No. A-19, I enclose the proposed report to be submitted by me to Senator MORSE relative to a bill (S. 2482) to establish a consistent and coordinated antimonopoly program, prevent or eliminate monopoly and monopolistic practices, and protect the public interest, wherever necessary, through effective methods of public control over monopoly and monopolistic practices. My views were requested by the Senator.

I shall appreciate it if you will advise me as to the relationship of the proposed report to the program of the President.

This report will also serve as a reply to your request for my views concerning this measure.

Sincerely yours,

TOM C. CLARK,
Attorney General.

PROPOSED REPORT TO BE SUBMITTED TO SENATOR MORSE ON S. 2482

This is in response to your request for my views relative to a bill (S. 2482) to establish a consistent and coordinated antimonopoly program, prevent or eliminate monopoly and monopolistic practices, and protect the public interest, wherever necessary, through effective methods of public control over monopoly and monopolistic practices.

The bill would provide that, in order to contribute to employment opportunities, the promotion of competitive free enterprise and the general welfare, and the development of interstate commerce, it shall be the policy of the Federal Government to develop a consistent and coordinated antimonopoly program, to foster competitive enterprises, prohibit participation in international cartels, eliminate discriminatory freight rates, prevent monopolistic practices with respect to patents, provide small business enterprises with assistance in obtaining capital, provide for a more adequate enforcement of the antitrust laws, and to protect the public interest through effective control of monopolistic practices (sec. 1).

Title I of the bill would authorize and direct the President of the United States, in consultation with the heads of the various departments and agencies of the Government, to develop a consistent and coordinated antimonopoly program, and to mobilize the resources of the Government for the administration of such a program (sec. 101). The President would be required in his report to the Congress at the beginning of every session to present a review of monopolistic practices existing in the United States, and to report on the activities of the Government to control such practices (sec. 102). He would be authorized and directed to make an annual study and investigation through the various Federal agencies of the extent to which monopolistic practices exist (sec. 103), and would be authorized and directed to submit such reorganization plans to the Congress as he deems necessary to obtain the most effective administration of the antimonopoly program (sec. 104).

This title is apparently in response to the President's message of January 14, 1946, to the Congress, in which he stated, "We must have an over-all antimonopoly policy which can be applied by all agencies of the Government in exercising the functions assigned to them * * *." (92 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 144.) With the exception of the provisions removing existing limitations on the President's reorganization powers, the title does not appear to grant him any authority he does not now possess. Its importance would seem to lie in the words "authorized and directed," which would impose a duty on the President to exercise the powers in question. It would seem that the exercise of such powers would produce a consistent Federal policy with respect to an antimonopoly program with all the resources of the Government concentrated upon its accomplishments. Periodic surveys would keep the program current.

Title II would prohibit any private person or business enterprise of the United States from participating or agreeing to participate in any agreement with a foreign business enterprise which has the purpose or effect "of restricting or controlling production, distribution, markets, prices, or use of patents, inventions, or other technology." The title would provide that the prohibitions shall not be construed to prevent compliance with the requirements of any international commodity agreement officially entered into by the United States, or to prevent agreements not designed to reduce competition (sec. 201). The penalties for violating the prohibitions would be those set forth in the antitrust laws as amended by title IV of the bill under consideration (sec. 202). The title would also provide that nothing in it shall be construed to prevent or interfere with the enforcement of the provisions of the antitrust laws or the acts to regulate commerce (sec. 203).

Existing law prohibits international agreements controlling production, distribution, markets, prices, or use of patents, or other technology when their purpose or effect is to restrain interstate or foreign commerce (15 U. S. C. 1).

Title II would extend such prohibitions to agreements or understandings between business enterprises of the United States and those of foreign nations, if the purpose or effect of such agreements would be to control production, distribution, markets, prices, use of patents, inventions, or other technology. While such extension would seem desirable in principle, I wish to point out that effective enforcement would be very difficult. The amendment of section 202 so as to provide civil as well as criminal sanctions with respect to violations of this title, might be helpful in this respect.

Title III would amend the Interstate Commerce Act so as to eliminate unjust and unreasonable freight rates for the purpose of encouraging the development of competitive private enterprise (sec. 301). It would add a new section entitled section 15B to the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, which would declare it to be in the interest of the United States that there be established a uniform classification and scale of rates for each class of property transported by rail, other than property for which individual commodity rates or exceptions are lawfully applicable. The Interstate Commerce Commission would be authorized and directed to prepare and make public within 9 months of the effective date of the section a proposed uniform classification for the transportation of such property, including rates scales which shall be designed for uniform application throughout the United States. Within 3 months after the publication of such classification and rates, hearings would be held at which any carrier or interested party could submit exceptions or modifications for consideration. After such hearings, the Commission shall issue an order or orders, to become effective not later than 2 years from the commencement of the hearings, requiring the establishment of the classification and rates applicable. This section would take effect 30 days after the date of the approval of the bill.

While the elimination of regional freight-rate inequalities would probably tend to develop new competitive enterprises, such development would depend upon the extent of the equalization of rates. It should be noted that the Interstate Commerce Commission has found that less than 5 percent of the total volume of carload freight traffic now moves under class rates, and that approximately 95 percent moves under commodity rates and exceptions (Interstate Commerce Commission Class Rate Investigation, p. 36, Mimeograph Decision (1946)). In this connection it should be noted that the bill does not provide a standard to guide the Commission in determining to what extent commodity and exception rates should be applicable in lieu of class rates. Accordingly, I suggest that consideration be given to amending the bill so that the principle of equalization be included among the standards to be applied by the Commission in determining the lawfulness of such rates.

Title IV would add four new sections (27 to 30, inclusive) to the Clayton Act.

Under new section 27, whenever the validity, scope, or infringement of any United States patent is involved in litigation, the United States court having jurisdiction thereof, would certify such fact to the Attorney General. The court may permit the United States to intervene in the action, and in so doing shall consider whether the intervention would promote the public interest. Upon intervention, the United States could present facts and law on any question relating to the patents involved including but not limited to questions of validity, scope, and use in violation of new section 29.

While, under existing law, if violations of the antitrust laws are present in a patent litigation, the United States may file its own action, the advantage of intervening in an infringement suit over the filing of a separate action is readily apparent. Under existing law, such intervention is rarely permitted over the objection of the plaintiff. The bill, by placing Government intervention within the discretion of the court, would seem to remove any danger of arbitrary Government partisanship in private litigation.

New section 28 would require that any conveyance, agreement, or assignment relating to patents be embodied in a written instrument to be filed with the United States Patent Office. For each violation of this section the bill would impose a penalty of $500 and a penalty of $25 for each day the violation continued, such penalties to accrue to the United States and be recoverable in a civil action. The penalties would not apply if the United States was a party to the transaction in question and if the transaction was entered into for the exclusive benefit of the United States.

Since the Department of Justice is the agency of the Government most interested in such agreements, I suggest that provision be made for filing in duplicate, the duplicate copy to be transmitted by the United States Patent Office to the Attorney General. This could be accomplished by inserting the following sentence immediately after the period following the word "here" in line 2, page 11, of the bill: "The Commissioner of Patents shall transmit a duplicate copy of each instrument, agreement, transfer, contract, or document filed pursuant to this section, to the Attorney General."

The penalty provision of section 28 would vest no discretion in the court as to the amount of the penalty. It is doubtful whether such a severe penalty should be imposed in all cases for failure to file. Accordingly, I suggest that the words "not more than" be inserted immediately following the word "of" in line 6, page 11, of the bill.

Section 29 would provide that any use of a patent or an interest therein which would extend the monopoly granted by the patent beyond the invention covered by such grant, including but not limited to any use restricting volume, price, use, or geographical area, shall be unlawful. A violation of this section or a conspiracy to violate it would constitute a misdemeanor and subject the offending party to a fine not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment not exceeding 1 year or both. The use of any patent in violation of this section would render the patent or patent application null and void.

The changes proposed in existing law by this section would materially contribute to the prevention of patent abuses. In the interest of clarity and to conform with the phraseology recommended by this Department for criminal provisions, I suggest that the last sentence of section 29 be amended to read as follows: "Every person who shall violate this section or who shall engage in any combination or conspiracy to violate this section shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 1 year or both."

Section 30 would provide that in any proceeding involving a violation of the antitrust laws or involving a patent or any interest therein, a party shall be entitled to show the invalidity or limited scope of any patent or patent rights involved.

In litigation involving patents where a violation of the antitrust laws is alleged, there should be no valid objection to legislative affirmation of the rule that local rules of estoppel and res adjudicata may not be invoked to protect evasions of the antitrust laws through the use of an invalid patent or through abuse of a patent. (Sola Electric Company v. Jefferson Electric Company (317 U. S. 173).) It would seem that a person should be free to show that the conduct in question does not derive legality from a patent.

Title V would provide that the Federal Loan Administrator, under the direction and supervision of the President, shall assist competitive small business enterprises in obtaining intermediate and long-term capital on terms commensurate with those available to large business enterprises, but in no event at an interest rate in excess of 4 percent per annum. The Administrator would also be authorized to assist competitive business enterprises of any size in obtaining capital for engaging in business activities which would promote competition or contribute to the elimination of monopolistic practices in operating, expanding, or improving plants leased or purchased under the Surplus Property Act of 1944, in developing or expanding business activities with respect to new projects, processes, or techniques. He would also be authorized to assist business enterprises in recovering from disasters due to physical causes (sec. 501). The Administrator would discharge his duties under the bill by guaranteeing credit by private institutions, or by providing credit directly (sec. 502). The President would be authorized to make an annual review of the specific industries and areas in which such credit should be made available (sec. 503). The funds and facilities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and its subsidiaries would be available to the Federal Loan Administrator for the purposes of the bill (sec. 504), and the Administrator would be required to make a quarterly report to the President and the Congress with respect to the matters provided in this title (sec. 505).

I find no objection to title V, but desire to point out that it seems to go further than the proposals of the President in his message to the Congress (92 Cong. Rec. 151).

Title VI would authorize the appropriation of $6,000,000 per annum to the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice to provide for a more adequate enforcement of the Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts, and to enable it properly to discharge its duties under the War Mobilization and Reconversion Act of 1944 and the Surplus Property Act of 1944. Both of these acts call for reports and opinions by the Department of Justice.

This title would also amend the definition of the word "person" in section 8 of the Sherman Act so as to include all known forms of business organizations and persons engaged in interstate commerce (sec. 602). It would substitute new definitions of the words "person," "commissioner," "director," "officer," and "antitrust provisions of the Tariff Act of 1913" for those now contained in section 1 of the Clayton Act (sec 604). It would amend section 14 of the Clayton Act by dividing the section into four subsections. Section 14 now provides that whenever a corporation shall violate any of the penal provisions of the antitrust laws, such violation shall be deemed to be also that of the individual directors, officers, or agents of the corporation who authorized, ordered, or did any of the acts constituting in whole or in part such violation. It provides further that the violation is a misdemeanor for which the director, officer, or agent may be fined a sum not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment not exceeding 1 year, or both. New subsection (a) would make the section applicable whenever a company violated any provision of the antitrust laws; that the knowledge of any officer or director of any act constituting in whole or in part the violation complained of would create a presumption that such person ordered or caused the act to be done; that if evidence adequate to rebut the presumption was introduced, the fact of such knowledge shall nevertheless be submitted to the jury or to the Court and to be considered as evidence or authorization.

The proposed amendment, by expanding the provisions of existing law to all antitrust prohibitions and in shifting the burden of proof on an issue where the evidence is peculiarly in the possession of the officer, director, or agent of the organization involved, would materially aid in bringing such persons within the prohibitions of the antitrust laws.

New subsection 14 (b) corresponds with the penal provisions of existing law. New subsection 14 (c) would provide that any officer or director chargeable under section 14 (a) of a violation of the antitrust laws shall forfeit to the United States twice the total compensation received by him from the offending corporation in respect of each month during which the violation occurred. If the penalty is less than $5,000, the Court may fix a sum not in excess of that amount. Such forfeitures would be recoverable by the United States in a civil action. New section 14 (d) would provide that an officer or director chargeable under section 14 (a) may be enjoined permanently or for a period of not less than 90 days from rendering any service to the offending organization, from receiving any compensation from such organization, or from engaging in business as a competitor of such organization. Further, the organization "shall" be enjoined from receiving any services from or paying any compensation to the offending director or officer.

The title further amends the Clayton Act by adding two new sections (14A and 14B). New section 14A would provide that any company violating the antitrust provisions set forth in section 14 (c) shall forfeit to the United States a sum equal to twice the net income received by it during the period of violation. If the forfeiture amounted to less than $25,000, the Court may fix the forfeiture at any sum not exceeding that amount. Such a forfeiture would be recoverable in a civil action. In an action tried by a jury, the Court may require a special verdict upon the question of liability, require the offending company to retain at its own expense public accountants, and may utilize the Federal Trade Commission, or an officer thereof, as a master in accordance with the procedure in section 7 of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

New section 14B would provide for the consolidation of proceedings against the same parties relating in whole or in part to the same act or acts brought to restrain a violation of the antitrust laws, to recover the forfeitures provided in the bill, or to restrain the employment or payment to an officer of the company. The right to a jury trial would be preserved (sec. 606).

Joinder of civil proceedings relating in whole or in part to the same act or acts and against the same parties would I believe facilitate the enforcement of the antitrust laws without prejudicing the rights of the defendants. The proposed civil penalties would strengthen the antitrust laws under which the gains derived from violations often exceed the maximum penalties which may now be imposed. I suggest, however, that it may be desirable to place some discretion in the courts as to the amount of penalties and, accordingly, suggest that sections 14 (c) and 14A be amended so as to provide a penalty of not less than half or more than double the compensation received by officers and directors and the net income received by corporations during each month of the period of violation. Such an amendment would enable the courts to adjust the penalty with respect to the facts and circumstances of each particular case.

Title VII would amend section 7 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. That section provides that in any antitrust action brought under the direction of the Attorney General the Court may refer the suit to the Federal Trade Commission as a master in chancery to ascertain and report an appropriate form of decree. Such recommendation, however, would not be binding on the Court. The amendment would limit such reference to cases in which it is requested by the Attorney General (sec. 701).

This title would, in addition, add two paragraphs to section 7. The first would provide that in any suit brought under the direction of the Attorney General to invoke remedies provided in the antitrust laws or to enforce the penalties thereof, the Court may, at the request of the Attorney General, refer the entire proceeding or any particular part thereof, to the Commission to take evidence, make findings of fact, draw conclusions of law, and to report these for such further proceedings as the court may direct. The foregoing is limited to cases in which the parties are not entitled to a jury trial or have waived their right to a jury trial.

Apparently the purpose of this amendment is to provide an expeditious, skilled, and uniform tribunal for certain types of civil antitrust cases which involve complicated issues. It appears desirable, and would round out the existing procedures for enforcing the antitrust laws.

The second of the new paragraphs would authorize the Commission either on its own motion or at the request of the Attorney General to investigate any law of a State or other political subdivision to ascertain whether the effect of such law is to interfere with the free flow of interstate commerce. If the investigation reveals such interference, the Commission would be authorized to hold hearings and to make findings of the facts relating to such effect. Such findings would become prima facie evidence in all Federal courts and would be made public by the Commission.

The foregoing amendment is designed to reach a problem which is becoming increasingly serious. It is a necessary element of a well-rounded antimonopoly program. I suggest, however, that the provision be amended so as to provide that representatives of the political unit enacting the challenged law may appear and introduce evidence either as amicus curiae or as intervenor.

Title VIII would authorize and direct the President to make a "regular review" of the operations of the various Government agencies, and if he shall ascertain that any of their policies fail to protect the public interest effectively against monopolistic practices, he shall issue such directives as are necessary to curtail or correct such policies (secs. 801 and 802). If the President determines that effective "public control" of a monopolistic practice is necessary and no such control exists, he shall submit to the Congress a specific program including legislative proposals to effectuate proper control (sec. 803).

It should be noted that "public control" would be defined by the bill as "any form of regulation or ownership of business enterprise" (sec. 901 (d)). Since I believe that public ownership should be recommended only if the President determines that no other form of control is adequate, I suggest that section 803 be amended accordingly.

Title IX contains miscellaneous matter in connection with the bill. Section 901 would define "monopoly," "monopolistic practices," "business enterprises," and "public control." Section 902 would provide that the bill would become effective 30 days after its enactment. Section 903 would provide the usual separability clause, and section 904 would provide that the act may be cited as the Antimonopoly Act of 1947.

I wish to draw your attention to a few typographical errors in the bill.

The word "to" between the words "authorized" and "directed" in line 24, page 12, should be changed to "and."

Line 8, page 14, erroneously refers to section 601. This reference should be to section 501. On the same page, in line 20, a reference is made to section 201. This reference should be to section 101.

Lines 1 and 2, page 25, now read, in part, "and have not waived their rights to such jury trial." Apparently this should read "or have waived their rights to such jury trial."

The foregoing suggestions are submitted to you for your consideration in redrafting the bill for introduction in the Eightieth Congress. This Department will be glad to consider the measure further in whatever form it is introduced.

I have been advised by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this report.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. WAYNE MORSE,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MORSE: This is with reference to your letter of August 1, 1946, requesting the views of the Department regarding the antimonopoly bill of 1947, S. 2482. There is attached copy of letter to Mr. F. J. Bailey, Director, Legislative Reference, Bureau of the Budget, setting forth the views of the Department in regard to the antimonopoly bill.

The Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there would be no objection to the submission of this letter.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
Washington, October 31, 1946.

Mr. F. J. BAILEY,
Assistant Director, Legislative Reference, Bureau of the Budget, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BAILEY: Reference is made to your letters of August 29 and September 18, 1946, requesting an expression of our views regarding S. 2482, a bill to establish a consistent and coordinated antimonopoly program, prevent or eliminate monopoly and monopolistic practices, and protect the public interest, wherever necessary, through effective methods of public control over monopoly and monopolistic practices.

This is an omnibus bill containing many provisions that have been the subject of separate legislative proposals from time to time. These provisions, which require diverse types of action by various Government agencies, have been presently combined for the purpose of establishing a coordinated antimonopoly program.

In line with its basic objective of promoting high-level production and a stable economy, the Department favors affirmative action to remove monopolistic restraints on production and trade. This is consistent with the Department's program for assisting and promoting business, particularly small business.

We agree with the sponsors of the bill, as so aptly stated by Senator MORSE on the floor of the Senate on Friday, July 26, 1946, that before the bill is shaped into final legislation there should be a careful study and investigation by the appropriate congressional committee into the objectives sought to be accomplished by the various provisions of the bill, and that this study be initiated at an early date. The Department is making a careful study of the bill and its representatives will be prepared to testify in detail as to the substantive provisions of the bill at the appropriate time.

Sincerely yours,

W. A. HARRIMAN,
Secretary of Commerce.

FEDERAL LOAN AGENCY,
Washington, September 9, 1946.

Mr. JAMES E. WEBB,
Director, Bureau of the Budget, State Department Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WEBB: Reference is made to the letter dated August 29, 1946, addressed to me by Mr. F. S. Bailey, requesting my views and suggestions with respect to the provisions of S. 2482, a bill to establish a consistent and coordinated antimonopoly program, prevent or eliminate monopoly and monopolistic practices, and protect the public interest, wherever necessary, through effective methods of public control over monopoly and monopolistic practices.

The Federal Loan Agency and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are directly affected only by title V, and my comments will be confined to the provisions of that title.

Under the provisions of title V, the Federal Loan Administrator is authorized and directed to assist—

(a) Competitive small business enterprises in obtaining credit on the basis of the considerations set forth in section 501 (a) and at interest rates (not in excess of 4 percent) commensurate with the rates available to large business enterprises.

(b) Competitive business enterprises, large or small, in obtaining credit for the purposes set forth in section 501 (b).

(c) Corporations established by State or local government, or local private nonprofit corporations, in obtaining capital for the purpose of helping to finance local competitive business enterprises.

(d) Business enterprises in recovering from floods, hurricanes, and other disasters due to physical causes.

These responsibilities are to be discharged by guaranteeing loans extended by private banks, corporations established by State or local governments, and local private nonprofit corporations, and, to the extent the needed credit is not thus made available, by making direct loans. The funds and facilities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are made available to the Federal Loan Administrator for the purpose of discharging his responsibilities under title V.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is already authorized, under existing legislation, to provide credit assistance to business enterprises, the small as well as the large, and it has for some time been performing substantially all of the lending functions contemplated by title V of S. 5482. Through June 28, 1946, the RFC authorized 30,469 loans, aggregating approximately $3,432,000,000 to business enterprises, either directly or in participation with local banks. About 30 percent of the loans authorized were to the small borrower who needed $5,000 or less. Loans of $25,000 or less made up about two-thirds of the total. Nine-tenths of all business loans authorized were under $100,000.

In view of these activities, it is questionable whether additional legislation which would to a large extent duplicate existing authority is necessary or desirable. If it is nevertheless deemed desirable to enact the provisions of title V of S. 2482, the following suggestions are offered:

(1) Since the exercise of lending functions in particular cases must ultimately be left to the sound discretion of the agency charged with the responsibility, the use of mandatory language seems inappropriate. It is, therefore, suggested that "authorized and directed" in sections 501 and 503 be changed to "authorized."

(2) The purposes for which business enterprises, large or small, are to be given credit assistance are set forth in subsection (b) of section 501, but no standards are stated for the granting of loans other than the standards contained in subsection (a) for small business enterprises. In view of the difficulties of administration in the absence of standards, it would seem desirable to include appropriate standards for loans to large business enterprises, particularly the type of loan contemplated by section 501 (b) (4), and subsections (a) and (b) might well be consolidated. In addition, standards should be included for credit assistance under subsection (c) of section 501.

(3) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation maintains 31 loan agencies and 41 branch offices conveniently located throughout the country, which are available to the Federal Loan Administrator. There is, therefore, no need for subsection (a) of section 502.

(4) Part of section 503 seems to overlap with the provisions of section 501. If section 503 is intended to grant to the Federal Loan Administrator additional powers that should be clarified.

(5) The Federal Loan Administrator is already authorized to supervise the administration and coordinate the activities of the RFC and its subsidiaries. There is, therefore, no need for the language contained in lines 7 to 10 on page 15 of the bill.

With kind personal regards,

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES B. HENDERSON,
Acting Federal Loan Administrator.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, September 10, 1946.

Hon. F. J. BAILEY,
Assistant Director, Bureau of the Budget, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BAILEY: Your letter of August 29 addressed to the Chairman of the Commission and requesting an expression of views and suggestions concerning S. 2482 (79th Cong. 2d sess.), introduced by Senator MORSE, "to establish a consistent and coordinated antimonopoly program, prevent or eliminate monopoly and monopolistic practices, and protect the public interest, wherever necessary, through effective methods of public control over monopoly and monopolistic practices," has been referred to our legislative committee. After careful consideration by that committee I am authorized to submit the following comments in its behalf:

S. 2482 consists of nine separate parts or titles, only one of which, "Title II—Eliminating Discriminating Freight Rates," relates to a subject concerning which we are in a position to offer suggestions. Our comments will therefore be confined to this part of the bill.

Title III, except for the introductory paragraph, is identical with S. 81 (79th Cong., 1st sess.), upon which we reported to the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, January 17, 1945, and S. 1124 (78th Cong., 1st sess.), upon which we reported to the same committee June 26, 1943. Copies of both reports were sent to your Bureau at the time of their rendition.

Briefly stated, the purpose of title III is "that there be established a uniform classification of property and a uniform scale of rates for application * * * to the transportation of property by railroad throughout the United States." On May 15, 1945, we issued our report in No. 28300, Class Rate Investigation, 1939, 262 I. C. C. 447, in which the railroad classifications of freight for the entire country were found to be unreasonable and unduly prejudicial as a whole and to the extent that they are not uniform. By that decision the railroads were given 90 days in which to signify whether they would undertake to submit for our approval a uniform freight classification for the entire country. Soon afterward the railroads assured us that they would cooperate in this undertaking and they have since actively started work on it. We believe that the work will be completed in a shorter time than would be required under the procedure which would be established if legislation such as that outlined in title III should be enacted by the Eightieth Congress.

In part II of the report above cited we found a permanent scale of class rates for uniform application in all the rate territories covered by the investigation in No. 28300 (embracing the entire country except mountain-Pacific territory), as reasonable, and as not unjustly discriminatory or unduly prejudicial, for application in connection with the uniform freight classification to be established, both intraterritorially and interterritorially within the geographical scope of the proceeding. Hence, so far as the greater part of the country is concerned, a uniform class-rate scale of the kind contemplated in title III has already been prescribed for application in connection with the uniform classification.

It is true that title III would require uniform application of a scale throughout the United States while our findings in No. 28300 did not include rates within or to and from mountain-Pacific territory. It is our purpose to investigate those rates as soon as the development of the new classification permits. Whether the uniform scale before mentioned, which has been prescribed for distances of 2,500 miles and less, will be extended for the greater distances to and from mountain-Pacific territory is a question which cannot be answered at this time. Title III, if read literally, would seem to require that that scale or one like it be so extended since it would require a scale "designed for uniform application throughout the United States." A scale as usually understood is a series of numbers of cents per 100 pounds, each of which is assigned to a block of progressing distances, the blocks each covering some 25 miles at most.

Since we believe that most of the broad objectives of title III will be attained through compliance with our findings in No. 28300, we see no advantage which would result from enactment of legislation of this kind. On the contrary, we see disadvantages because the bill apparently would lay down certain positive requirements to govern the rate structure, removing the flexibility permitted by the Interstate Commerce Act as it now reads, under which this Commission exercises its administrative discretion upon consideration of the facts bearing upon situations as they arise. In many respects the proposed requirements are not clear.

The question would arise whether the rates prescribed under the mandate of title III would be maximum or minimum or maximum and minimum, or precise rates. Presumably they would be the latter. There would also be the question whether the rate between two points over all workable routes could be based on the distance over the most direct route with relief from the long-and-short-haul provision at intermediate points on the circuitous routes.

Another question would be whether railroads would be permitted or could be required to join with water carriers in rail-water rates made differentially lower than those between the same points over all-rail routes, as is now commonly the case. Likewise, it is not clear whether all-rail routes could maintain rates lower than those in the uniform scale in recognition of water competition.

Competition between communities, particularly competing ports, must be considered in this connection. For example, there are now export and import class rates between the Gulf ports and central territory lower than the class rates on domestic traffic to and from the same points. Under this adjustment the export and import class rates between Chicago and New Orleans have been the same as those between Chicago and Baltimore, although New Orleans' distance is 100 miles greater. The question would arise at once whether such departures from uniformity as this would be permissible if this bill were enacted.

By paragraph 3 of the bill the Commission apparently would be required to specify the property for which individual commodity rates or exceptions should be lawfully applicable in lieu of class rates. Since there is no definite standard of differentiation between class-rate and commodity-rate traffic, it seems not unlikely that any attempt to classify the various articles of commerce as uniformly suitable for application of class rates or of commodity rates would produce a major controversy.

The provision in section 6 for exceptions and modifications deemed "necessary to correct inequitable conditions, provide adequate transportation in particular areas or provide adequate revenues for particular railroads" seems likely to give rise to controversy. The expression "inequitable conditions" introduces a new and indefinite concept not now found in the statutes defining the Commission's rate-making powers. Its interpretation and application would undoubtedly prove very troublesome in the absence of a precise congressional standard.

Since title III involves only transportation by railroads, its restrictions on the exercise of the initiative of the carrier in making rates would not apply to other forms of transportation, such as motor carriers and water carriers. Such legislation would strongly tend to impair the ability of the railroads to compete with those carriers as well as with each other, as they do at present. It is difficult to reconcile this probable effect with the general policy stated in section 1 of the bill "to contribute to * * * the promotion of competitive free enterprise" and "to foster competitive private enterprise."

We suggest that if a bill similar to S. 2482 should be introduced in the Eightieth Congress, title III should be omitted.

Very truly yours,

WALTER M. W. SPLAWN,
Chairman, Legislative Committee.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, February 5, 1947.

Hon. WAYNE MORSE,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MORSE: On January 10, 1947, the Commission transmitted to the Bureau of the Budget a letter addressed to you in which we commented at length on your bill, S. 2482, introduced on July 5, 1946. Such comment would be equally applicable to your bill, S. 72, introduced on January 6, 1947. The Director of the Bureau has forwarded to you by letter of January 24 a copy of our letter above referred to.

He has also informed us that subject to our consideration of the views contained in his letter to you and in a memorandum which accompanied it that "there would be no objection by this office to the presentation to Senator MORSE of such a report" as the Commission may deem appropriate. Accordingly, having considered the views of the Bureau thus expressed and being of the opinion that no change in such comments is called for, the Commission herewith submits to you the same letter of comment with regard to S. 72 that was submitted to the Bureau of the Budget on January 10, 1947, with regard to S. 2482, introduced July 5, 1946.

By direction of the Commission.

Sincerely yours,

LOWELL B. MASON,
Acting Chairman.

FEBRUARY 5, 1947.

Hon. WAYNE MORSE,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

Re S. 2482, Seventy-ninth Congress, second session.

MY DEAR SENATOR MORSE: In further response to your letter of August 1 requesting our comment and views on the above bill, the Commission would state as follows:

The need for greater coordination of effort in halting or reversing the trend toward that growing concentration of economic power which is the alter ego of monopoly has been increasingly impressed upon the Commission. The fact that such concentration and monopoly have developed to their present menacing proportions is good evidence that governmental efforts to prevent such development have been lacking, either in the amount of countervailing power applied, in the efficiency and potency of its application, or in both. Otherwise we should have to concede the inherent inability of democratic government to achieve a solution of the problem and thereby to realize its own most fundamental policy. It is gratifying to note the recognition which this bill embodies that no solution can be expected without greater expenditure of governmental effort and money and greater coordination among governmental agencies dealing with the problem. The problem is so complex and so urgent that it seems safe to say it is highly improbable that too much effort and money can be spent on it. There is room, of course, for reasonable differences of opinion concerning the nature of the necessary coordination.

With these preliminary general observations the bill will be discussed title by title.

TITLE I. CONSISTENT AND COORDINATED ANTI-MONOPOLY PROGRAM

The reference in section 102 to the President's economic report to the Congress at the beginning of every session is presumably a reference to the economic report provided for under the act of Congress approved February 20, 1946, and known as the Employment Act of 1946. The proposal that the President report annually as a part of the report provided for under the Employment Act with specific reference to monopolistic conditions and to the measures being taken and projected toward their correction would, if enacted into law, give no more than due prominence to a matter of fundamental importance. It also has a direct and substantial relationship to the problem of full employment with which the Employment Act deals and the solution of which the act requires be sought "in a manner calculated to foster and promote free competitive enterprise and the general welfare." The provision of section 103 authorizing and directing the President "to make an annual study and investigation of the extent to which monopoly and monopolistic practices exist in industry, trade, and agriculture" presupposes adequate knowledge of present monopolistic conditions throughout industry, trade, and agriculture, and would necessitate a continuous study in order to keep such knowledge current. The attainment of that goal would involve far-reaching extension of the investigating functions of governmental agencies dealing with the subject. Over a period of many years this Commission has accumulated what is probably the best and largest body of relevant factual information in the hands of any agency, but it falls far short of being such current and comprehensive data as title I contemplates.

To do our part in such a program would involve a rather complete and systematic exercise of the Commission's power to obtain information under the provisions of section 6 of its organic act. It would seem to involve placing much greater emphasis on the Commission's functions of obtaining relevant information on its own initiative under sections 6 (a), 6 (b), 6 (c), 6 (f), 6 (g), and 6 (h) of its organic act, as distinguished from its functions of obtaining such information at the direction of the President or either House of Congress under section 6 (d) or upon request of the Attorney General under section 6 (e). Manifestly such an emphasis and the extensive exercise of such initiative would call for a much larger staff than the Commission has been able to provide under its quite modest appropriations.

Section 104 (a) of title I would authorize and direct the President, in accordance with the Reorganization Act of 1945, but not limited by the restrictions and exemptions of such act, to submit such reorganization plans as he deems necessary to obtain the most effective administration of the coordinated antimonopoly program. As a practical matter it is clear that the only agencies to which this proposed coordination of functions would apply are the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission. The Commission's views and comments upon this part of the bill are, of course, to be appraised with due regard to the fact that the Commission itself would be directly and probably somewhat adversely affected. But taking as detached and objective a view as possible, the Commission believes that there are cogent reasons for doubting the soundness of this proposal and for suggesting an alternative which it believes would be more in the public interest and which would also provide greater coordination of governmental effort to control monopoly. We start with the proposition that by the laws creating it and defining its powers and duties, the Commission itself has already been made the nucleus of a consistent and coordinated antimonopoly program. It is a program which includes the basic ingredients of thoroughgoing investigation, expert economic and local analysis, and remedial civil process subject to court review, together with advisory reports, for the benefit of Congress, the President and the public. By reason of the Presidential power to appoint the members of the Commission, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and by reason of the judicial review of the Commission's injunctive orders provided by its organic act, the Commission's functions and being already represent a substantial coordination of effort on the part of all three branches of the Government in the control of monopoly and monopolistic practice.

One of the Commission's basic functions has been the institution of formal remedial process against parties violating the laws against unfair, monopolistic, oppressive, and discriminatory practices. These laws were intended to supplement the Sherman Antitrust Act and to reach restraints of trade in their incipiency. It is also clear from the legislative history of these laws that Congress was seeking a remedy for a twofold evil, (a) coercive practices against competitors and (b) voluntary combinations among competitors to exploit the markets. The former were condemned primarily because they were unfair to competitors. By the use of coercive methods individual competitors had been driven out of business or had suffered serious financial loss. The latter were condemned primarily because they were unfair to American consumers, producers, and workmen. Voluntary combinations and conspiracies of this type had eliminated competition and artificially raised prices to the consumer, depressed the prices of agricultural products, and lowered wages.

The Supreme Court's interpretations of the Federal Trade Commission Act and of related statutes have embodied a clear recognition that these acts were aimed at both types of evils. By a line of decisions extending to the Supreme Court over a period of more than 20 years the Commission's jurisdiction has been established over both voluntary and involuntary restraints upon competition. As a result, the statutes administered by the Commission now serve as law against unfair competitive methods used either by individual concerns or in combination against a competitor, and also as law against voluntary or mutual agreements, combinations, and conspiracies designed not to injure a competitor but to suppress competition among competitors. How vigorously and how effectively the Commission has exercised such functions can be seen from the following tabulation:

Number of cases[1] involving trade restraints instituted by Federal Trade Commission between 1915 and 1946, the number of orders to cease and desist in such cases, and the results of court review thereof

[1] Where any proceeding involved violations of more than 1 statute each violation was treated as a separate case.

The most striking thing about the above showing is that about 17 percent of all complaints issued by the Commission have been trade restraint cases, that out of the 887 such cases instituted orders to cease and desist were entered in 502, of which number only 92 cases were appealed to the courts and of the 81 such cases decided by the courts the Commission's orders were sustained completely in 38 and with some modification in 15. In more than 400 cases the respondents filed reports of compliance with the Commission's orders to cease and desist and are presumably obeying them. It appears that orders to cease and desist were entered in about 60 percent of the Clayton and Robinson-Patman Act cases as against only about 55 percent in cases brought under the Federal Trade Commission Act, notwithstanding that some 11 percent fewer cases were instituted under the Clayton and Robinson-Patman Acts. Incidentally, it also appears that the Commission dismissed about 45 percent of the tabulated cases instituted under the Federal Trade Commission Act, and about 40 percent of those instituted under the Clayton and Robinson-Patman Acts, a fact that precludes any idea that the Commission prejudges a case when it issues a complaint and that an order to cease and desist is a foregone conclusion thereafter.

An outstanding feature of the Commission's work in this field, and especially in recent years, is that it has made good progress in bridging the theoretical gap that formerly existed between restraints of trade brought about by definite conspiracies and those brought about by concurrent and parallel monopolistic action of ostensibly competing rivals. Having the advantage of being able to proceed on the one hand against restraints of trade in their incipiency and monopolistic practices as such, without the necessity of establishing conspiracy and unlawful concert of action among competitors, and on the other hand being able to proceed against the more tangible conspiracies and combinations as well, the Commission, with the support of the courts, has substantially narrowed the twilight areas between those two classes of cases and has illuminated and bids fair to dissipate the fog under which tacit agreements have operated undisturbed for years. The Commission has convinced the courts that some of the price-fixing devices employed by organized industry, particularly those used to create identity of delivered price quotations among widely scattered sellers, are inherently collusive and therefore inherently unfair methods of competition. It has also convinced the courts that some of such devices are inherently discriminatory under the Clayton Act, as amended, even without proof or a finding of collusive action.

The court decisions which give rise to the above observations are as follows: A. E. Staley Manufacturing Company v. Federal Trade Commission (324 U. S. 746); Corn Products Refining Company v. Federal Trade Commission (324 U. S. 726); Salt Producers Association v. Federal Trade Commission (134 F. (2d) 354); American Chain & Cable Company v. Federal Trade Commission (142 F. (2d) 909); Eugene Dietzgen Company et al v. Federal Trade Commission (142 F. (2d) 321); United States Maltsters Association v. Federal Trade Commission (152 F. (2d) 161); Milk & Ice Cream Can Institute v. Federal Trade Commission (152 F. (2d) 478); Fort Howard Paper Company et al. (C. C. A. 7, decided July 12, 1946 (unreported)).

The devices referred to fall into the general category widely known as the basing-point system and variants thereof. While the Commission had pioneered in this field by its Pittsburgh Plus order of 1924, the approval and support of the courts in the respects above referred to have been a matter of the last 5 years. Even the war did not preclude the Commission from obtaining such results. Those results would seem to have confirmed the advance opinion of former Attorney General Cummings that the Commission was especially well equipped to deal exclusively with the problem. In his published letter to the President dated April 26, 1937, recommending the appointment of what later became known as the Temporary National Economic Committee, the Attorney General referred back to the Commission its suggestion that he attempt the remedial solution of the basing-point question and stated that "a problem is presented which can be more satisfactorily investigated and dealt with through the more flexible remedies of the Federal Trade Commission," that "the administrative and quasi-judicial remedies" in its hands "may be better adapted to the control of the subject matter" than action by the Attorney General, and that "the machinery of the courts is not geared to the handling of the social and economic factors necessarily involved."

The Commission submits that the foregoing considerations are such as to logically pose the question whether the desirable objective of coordination would not be better served by concentrating in the Commission responsibility for protecting the public interest in the entire problem of monopoly with the exception of such remedial criminal process as may be necessary and possibly even there to invite the Commission's views on the desirability of criminal prosecution in given cases. We can see no advantage to the public in the absorption of our agency by another and the subordination of its functions to those of another agency. The bipartisan composition of the Commission and its direct responsibility to Congress which is the constitutional repository of the power to regulate commerce, are at odds with any idea of concentrating such regulatory functions under the control of a one-party executive branch of the Government. Taking the platform declarations of the Democratic and Republican Parties against monopoly at their face value and as an expression of coordinated opposition to monopoly, it is more fitting that both parties be represented in applying the remedies which a bipartisan Congress has provided.

In this connection it is relevant to note that section 5 (b) of the Reorganization Act would definitely permit the presentation of a reorganization plan transferring the functions of any agency not named in the section to any agency named therein. Under this provision coordination of effort against monopoly could now be lawfully achieved by transfer to the Federal Trade Commission of other agency functions, rather than by transfer of functions away from the Commission, which the statute now definitely prohibits.

TITLE II. PROHIBITION OF AMERICAN PARTICIPATION IN INTERNATIONAL CARTELS

The proposal to outlaw participation by American business in international cartels would seem to have everything to commend it and nothing to condemn it. The determination of the conditions on which foreign producers may enter or be prevented from entering our domestic markets should be actually, as it is theoretically, in the hands of Congress and not in the hands of private combinations, as so often it has been as a matter of fact. International cartels which divide the available world markets and especially those which reciprocally protect domestic producers from foreign competition are in restraint of international trade for the same reason that domestic combinations are in restraint of domestic trade. An agreement between American concerns and their competitors from another country that each will refrain from entering the others' home market is manifestly a complete suppression of trade between such countries as to the commodities included in the agreement.

Whether the proposed prohibition should be qualified so as to apply only to American participation in cartels for keeping foreign competitors out of our domestic market or fixing their prices and quotas in such market and to permit participation in cartels which have such effects only in other countries, is from one aspect only a moral or ethical question, but presumably the suppression of international trade anywhere by international cartels would indirectly and pro tanto produce adverse effects on such trade elsewhere. Such effects are somewhat analogous to the untoward effects which frequently appear among the member-beneficiaries of a domestic combination in restraint of trade, such as the necessity of restricting production and the volume of commodities offered for sale in order to maintain prices.

TITLE III. ELIMINATING DISCRIMINATORY FREIGHT RATES

This Commission has been given no official jurisdiction over this matter but has had occasion to observe the effect of freight rates upon systems of identical delivered prices of commodities where the freight makes up a large proportion of the delivered cost. Where the cost of freight varies, as among competing shipper-sellers, the only way they can match each other's delivered price quotations is by systematically varying their respective prices f. o. b. factory with the result that their nearby customers pay more and their distant customers pay less after making due allowance for differences in the cost of delivery to them. Frequently this involves collection by the shipper-seller of substantial amounts of "phantom freight," a term which includes a charge for freight when there is no actual freight or a larger charge for freight than is actually incurred. This was held to be unlawful price discrimination in the Staley and Corn Products cases before referred to. Rail freight is usually taken as the basis for calculating the freight factor because rail rates are more stable and are a matter of public record.

In situations where such discriminations in price are superimposed upon discrimination in freight rates the results are doubly serious. Any increase in freight rates from the basing point, even though it is not a discriminatory increase, automatically steps up the amount collected as "phantom freight" by shipper-sellers who are located nearer freightwise to the customer than are shipper-sellers located at the basing point. In the Staley case there was one instance where the freight factor in the delivered price was increased four times the amount of increase in the actual rail freight from the nonbasing point shipper. In the Pittsburgh Plus case the Commission found that Birmingham steel fabricators were greatly handicapped in competition with Pittsburgh fabricators in that the latter could compete readily in Birmingham while the Birmingham fabricators could compete in only part of the area between the two cities. If, as now alleged on respectable authority, there is also a discrimination in freight rates between the sections represented by the two cities, it is not difficult to see how southern industry may be handicapped by such a double discrimination. A similar condition appears to exist in the far West. Steel fabricators on the Pacific coast claim they are handicapped in competing with fabricators farther east by reason of steel prices which are higher by the amount of "phantom freight" from eastern basing points, which amount is included in the price of steel produced on the Pacific coast. This handicap is purportedly enlarged by an alleged discrimination in rail freight rates against Pacific coast fabricators on their shipments to the East.

Although subscribing to the general proposition that discriminatory freight rates should be eliminated and pointing out that price discrimination on a commodity quoted at identical delivered prices may complement and complicate freight-rate discrimination, the Commission does not feel that it is competent to offer suggestions as to the ways and means of eradicating discrimination in freight rates which are provided in title III.

TITLE IV. PREVENTING OR ELIMINATING MONOPOLISTIC PRACTICES WITH RESPECT TO PATENTS

This title would amend the Clayton Act by the addition of four new sections to be inserted at the end of the present statute. The proposal to have courts inform the Attorney General whenever the validity, scope, or enforcement of any patent is involved in a case and to permit his intervention where the public interest would be served, would seem to be sound and well-considered legislation. It is entirely fitting that the public interest be directly represented in such suits in order to safeguard the public interest by protecting it, among other things, against the possibility of an agreed private settlement of the suit that might encroach upon the public interest by unfairly extending the patent monopoly.

The proposed requirement that all sales, assignments, and agreements relating to patents and all transfers of patent rights by license or otherwise be in writing, and that they be registered with a public agency, is a logical safeguard against the use of patents to prevent or destroy competition beyond the legitimate scope of the patent monopoly. While the repository of such papers may be only an incident, it may be noted that the TNEC recommended that such papers be filed with the Federal Trade Commission. In view of the fact that the Commission has concurrent jurisdiction over enforcement of those sections of the Clayton Act which relate to restraints of trade and that it has been active in such enforcement, it would appear that coordination of effort would be promoted by following the recommendation of the TNEC. There is a palpable advantage in having the relevant records readily available in the agency which has the remedial jurisdiction rather than in a neutral agency, such as the Patent Office. So far as coordination of effort between the Commission and the Department of Justice is concerned, their concurrent jurisdiction over the Clayton Act which has existed ever since 1914 on a successful cooperative basis would not be adversely affected.

The proposal to prohibit generally extensions of the patent monopoly beyond the invention covered by the grant would manifestly constitute a coordination of effort between the National Legislature and the Federal courts as it would only confirm and expand the more recent principles announced by such courts. To the extent that the more specific prohibitions included under that general prohibition actually fall within those principles, it would seem that the same considerations should govern. There can be little doubt that these various specific prohibitions, such as those relating to the licensor's right to fix the price at which the licensee or assignee may sell or to limit the amount produced and the selling territory covered, are limitations upon competition by their very nature. The only question is whether they are within or beyond the scope of the patent monopoly. This is primarily a question of law and whether the public interest is better served by a strict or liberal construction of the statute which grants a legal monopoly through patents. It is obvious that a strict construction widens the field in which the antitrust policy and program would apply, and a liberal construction correspondingly narrows it. The tendency of the courts is toward a stricter construction than in the past.

TITLE V. CREDIT ASSISTANCE FOR SMALL AND COMPETITIVE ENTERPRISE

This title would provide either Government guaranty of private loans or direct Government loans in aid of small competitive business enterprise on terms commensurate with those available to large enterprise but not exceeding 4 percent. Such loans must take into account, among other things, the "potential contribution to the creation and maintenance of employment opportunities for those able, willing, and seeking to work and the prospect of repayment." The title would also provide similar loans to either large or small enterprises which need capital "for the purpose of engaging in business activities which promote competition or contribute to the elimination, prevention, or curbing of monopoly or monopolistic practices." As to these latter loans, there is apparently no required relation to employment, maximum interest rates, and prospects of repayment. Assuming, however, that in either case the making of improvident loans is not to be countenanced, the question is one of broad public policy, namely, whether in order to promote such a fundamental public policy as free competitive enterprise and under a situation which by hypothesis demands drastic action, the Government will provide temporary financial assistance as it has frequently done in promoting other broad public policies. The country's history is filled with instances where lavish gifts of public property, loans, direct and indirect subsidies, or other governmental favors have been extended to private parties whose private interests were thought to represent or coincide with the national interest.

However, if such loans are to be made as part of a program to curb monopoly, it is highly important that the exact conditions be laid down in advance as to the nature of the business activities which will be given in return for such loans. Little or nothing is to be gained by the mere enlargement of the number of competitors engaged in a given industry if the publicly subsidized new competitors proceed to correlate their trade practices and policies with those of established concerns in such a way as to frustrate competition in price and in related forms. In that event the chief consideration flowing to the public would have failed, and the Government would then have become only a competitor of private lending institutions. The theory of the proposed program of governmental financial assistance in aid of competitive enterprise is apparently predicated in part upon the belief that private lenders may be averse to promoting competition with established concerns of monopolistic power and influence, to which they may have already made loans, and that this prejudices their judgment in ways having nothing to do with the prospects of repayment or the public interest in promoting competition. The problem is one of proper correlation between and synthesis of the inherent risks of competitive endeavor and the inherent conservatism of those who have lending power over the social accumulation of savings and the power to pledge the future to meet future as well as present needs.

Under section 501 (b), (c), and (d) there is no distinction between large and small enterprises in obtaining loans for the various purposes specified, but only in section 501 (b) (1) is the purpose expressly specified of promoting competition and curbing monopoly and monopolistic practices. It is a matter of inference whether the instances specified in 501 (b) (2), (3), (4), and in (c) and (d) will serve that end. Unless they do so serve their place in an antimonopoly program, is not apparent. Under section 501 (b) (3) it would be necessary for someone to determine what constitutes underdevelopment in any area and to substitute governmental determination of that question for private determination. Section 501 (c) and (d) involve the assumption that existing enterprises should be retained or restored independently of their relation to the promotion of competition or the curbing of monopoly, although (c) is not necessarily limited to existing enterprises. These observations are made merely in order that the implications of the title may be understood. If enacted into law they would be in pari materia with the Employment Act of 1946, regardless of their relation to the problem of monopoly. Insofar as it seeks to ascertain to what extent the need for financing of competitive enterprise is being met by private and other non-Federal financial institutions and organizations, section 505 is quite analogous to the Employment Act. Given a condition in some industry where additional competition is desirable, there will always be a question whether that end is better achieved by providing additional competitors by improving the vigor and quality of competition among existing concerns.

TITLE VI. MORE ADEQUATE ENFORCEMENT OF THE SHERMAN AND CLAYTON ANTITRUST ACTS

The Commission is highly favorable toward the proposed appropriation of $6,000,000 for the work of the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice. According to the Department's report to the Temporary National Economic Committee in 1940, there were instituted a total of 262 civil proceedings in antitrust cases during the 50 years following the passage of the Sherman Act in 1890, an average of something over five cases per year. The Department obtained consent decrees in 1943 of such cases and won 64 in the trial courts, making a total of 207 victories. Of the 47 cases appealed the Department won 26. There would be every reason to expect an equally good future record in proportion as increased funds are made available, by contrast with the relatively small appropriations of former years.

The $6,000,000 appropriation is for the specific purpose among others, of facilitating development of an orderly and comprehensive program of enforcement of the Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts." Such a program can hardly be comprehensive unless it comprehends the activities of this Commission which, by statute, has had concurrent civil jurisdiction over the antitrust provisions of the Clayton Act since 1914 and whose jurisdiction since 1927 has been established by the courts on a substantially similar basis with regard to voluntary restraints of trade which also constitute violations of the Sherman Act. The considerations which support the proposed appropriation would also support an increased appropriation for this Commission in order that it might enlarge the exercise of such remedial jurisdiction beyond what is known in the tabulation appearing at page 5 hereof. That record of accomplishment would seem to constitute most substantial grounds for such a suggestion. This, however, again raises the question as to the relative desirability of transferring the Commission's functions to the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice, as against concentrating in the Commission all civil jurisdiction over the antitrust laws. Concurrent jurisdiction, however, is not necessarily without advantage because it affords perhaps a little wholesome competition in the application of the antitrust laws so as to effectively carry out the public policy embodied in them.

The proposed amendments to the Clayton Act embodied in sections 604 to 607, inclusive, of the bill, have the laudable general objective of strengthening enforcement of the antitrust laws. Among these are proposals for broadening the definition of parties subject to the Clayton Act, of extending responsibility for antitrust violations on the part of corporations to their officers and directors, of making such officers and directors personally liable to fine, imprisonment, or to civil penalties twice the amount of their corporate compensation, of enjoining such individuals from performing services to the corporation, receiving compensation from it, or engaging in competition with it, of enjoining the corporation from receiving services from such individuals or paying for them, and imposing on offending corporations civil penalties equal to twice their net income during the period of violation. Some of the proposals may appear drastic, but are evidently predicated on the belief that existing penalties and sanctions have been proved to be inadequate, a belief which the Commission's experience and observation indicate has substantial foundation.

It is noted that under sections 605 and 606 the various penalties and sanctions above described are applicable specifically to those who violate section 3 or section 7 of the Clayton Act. Sections 3 and 7 of the Clayton Act being specifically within the concurrent remedial jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission under section 11 of the act, this proposal might raise the question whether the Commission's orders to cease and desist from such violations could not logically have the same breadth and scope as the court injunctions provided for, especially since such orders of the Commission are subject to court review. The proposal to revise section 7, however, by enlarging the applicable sanctions, is of little importance so long as the basic defects in the section are permitted to continue. Such defects have been pointed out by the Commission in its annual reports and otherwise on numerous occasions, and a bill correcting some of such defects was reported out by the Judiciary Committee of the House during the last session of Congress. (See H. R. 4810, 79th Cong.)

TITLE VII. FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION AS MASTER IN CHANCERY

This title would amend section 7 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. The present section 7 would be retained without change except that the court could not appoint the Commission as a master in chancery to formulate a decree except "at the request of the Attorney General," whereas at present the court may do this on its own motion. Presumably this change is intended to promote coordination of effort, but since there is nothing in the present section to prevent the Attorney General from making such a request, the proposed change would merely take away some of the discretion now lodged in the court as to whether the Commission should be made a master.

It is proposed further to amend section 7 of the Federal Trade Commission Act by the adoption of two wholly new paragraphs. The first of these would authorize the court at the request of the Attorney General in any antitrust case brought by him where a jury trial is not required, to refer the case or particular issues therein to the Commission "to take testimony and evidence, to make a finding of fact thereon, and to draw conclusions of law therefrom." The Commission would be required to report promptly to the court "its findings and conclusions" and transmit the record, whereupon "such further proceedings shall be had in relation thereto as the court shall direct." In other words, the Commission would follow the same hearing procedure as though it had initiated the proceeding and entered an order disposing of the case under its own present remedial jurisdiction, but would become strictly an advisory fact-finding body and a proposer of tentative legal conclusions. Such findings of fact would not be conclusive if supported by substantial evidence as they are in cases initiated by the Commission and disposed of by its order to cease and desist. The Commission's relation to the court under the proposed amendment would be the same as that of the Commission's trial examiners to the Commission.

We believe that the public interest would be better served by a more extensive exercise of our own remedial functions in similar cases, including the initiation of formal complaints and the making of remedial orders subject to limited judicial review, as against the unlimited court review that this proposal would entail. The theory and genius of administrative law and procedure lies in coordinated governmental effort by combining the functions of investigation, prosecution, decision and enforcement in one body, having due regard for court review and due process. To whatever extent that the Commission's time would be occupied with the proposed function of advising the trial courts on the facts and law, it would be hampered to a corresponding extent in initiating its own remedial orders for review by the appellate courts. Such an abbreviation of the Commission's functions would be not only derogatory of the principle of full administrative agency jurisdiction but destructive of the existing coordination embodied in such jurisdiction.

The second paragraph proposed for addition to section 7 would authorize the Commission to investigate on its own motion or at the request of the Attorney General the operation and effect of State statutes or municipal ordinances as constituting possible interference with or barriers to the free flow of commerce across State lines. Hearings for taking evidence on the subject, such evidence to be presented either by the Attorney General or by the Commission, and findings of fact by the Commission regarding the operation and effect of such laws on interstate commerce, are provided for. The Commission's findings of fact would be prima facie evidence in all Federal courts in cases where such facts are material or relevant, and shall be made public in all cases by the Commission. How much this adds to the present investigatory powers of the Commission is debatable, but its findings based upon such investigations would be given a definite legal standing that they do not now possess. There may be circumstances under which the making of such investigation and findings would be clearly in the public interest. A coordinated Federal program that does not take into account such barriers to the flow of interstate commerce would be lacking pro tanto in coordination.

TITLE VIII. WHERE NECESSARY, EFFECTIVE PUBLIC CONTROL OF MONOPOLY AND MONOPOLISTIC PRACTICES

This title is designed to promote coordination of effort in the antimonopoly program by authorizing and directing the President to make regular reviews of the operations of the various regulatory agencies and commissions, to issue such binding directives to them "in conformity with existing law as he may deem necessary to curtail or correct" such of their policies as he ascertains "may fail to protect the public interest effectively against monopoly or monopolistic practices," and to submit to Congress where necessary a legislative program providing for "effective public control of a monopoly or a monopolistic practice."

While the general objectives of this title are beyond criticism, it raises again the question of the correct relationship between Congress, the independent bypartisan regulatory commissions now responsible to Congress, and the executive branch of the Government. Coupled with section 104 (a) of title I, this title would authorize the President to make this Commission directly responsible to him, instead of to Congress. This would involve a reconsideration and reversal of the whole philosophy underlying the creation of bipartisan regulatory commissions, a philosophy which cannot be adequately discussed here. One relevant phase of that philosophy, however, is that it contemplates the restoration and regulation of competition rather than the acceptance and attempted regulation of monopoly.

The phrase "in conformity with existing law" is not clearly limited in its application to law existing before passage of the proposed bill, but could readily be applied to the bill itself if enacted into law. In that case, situations might easily arise involving substantial questions of possible conflict between preexisting law and the Presidential directives. In such event the regulatory agency would have to choose between its responsibility to Congress and to the President, again raising the fundamental question of the correct relationships between the three.

TITLE IX. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

By defining public control in this title as "any form of regulation or ownership of business enterprise," the way would be opened to Presidential recommendations for Government ownership and operation of industry as a part of the coordinated antimonopoly program. Since the President could make such recommendations even without the proposed authority there would seem to be no substantial reason against so providing. There may be situations, as in the case of TVA, where the Government should be able to resort to Government ownership and operation. Indeed, if permanent private monopoly is inescapable, the opposition to public control through public ownership and operation loses much of its force.

The definition of monopoly in section 901 (a) overlaps with the definition of monopolistic practice in 901 (b), since both include combinations and conspiracies and the Supreme Court has held combinations and conspiracies in restraint of trade as the equivalent of monopoly (Standard Oil Company v. United States (221 U.S.1)). A more substantial criticism, however, is that the definition of monopolistic practice is too narrow, because it is confined to contracts, combinations, and conspiracies in restraint of trade. The Commission has proceeded against monopolistic practices which did not take the form of combinations and conspiracies, and in so doing it has been upheld by the courts under both the Federal Trade Commission Act and the Clayton Act (Federal Trade Commission v. Beech-nut Packing Co. (257 U. S. 441); Corn Products Refining Company v. Federal Trade Commission (324 U. S. 726); A. E. Staley Mfg. Co. v. Federal Trade Commission (324 U. S. 746)).

Further development of that line of action against monopoly and monopolistic practices would seem to be the natural nucleus for a coordinated antimonopoly program.

The Commission appreciates the invitation to comment and express its views on the bill as a whole, but pretends to no special experience or competence except as to those parts of the bill which involve industrial monopoly and monopolistic practices, and even there its experience and competence are not the same with regard to all aspects of the subject.

If we can be of further service, do not hesitate to call upon us.

By direction of the Commission.

Very sincerely yours,

LOWELL B. MASON,
Acting Chairman.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, it had been my purpose to suggest the holding of an executive session this afternoon. The attendance on the floor at this time does not encourage such a course of action, and I therefore move that the Senate stand in adjournment until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 17, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

The following-named candidates for promotions in the Regular Corps of the United States Public Health Service:

SENIOR DENTAL SURGEON TO BE DENTAL DIRECTOR

Eugene C. Stamm

SENIOR ASSISTANT SURGEON TO BE SURGEON

SENATE

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1947

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord of our life, we would know Thee better, that we might love Thee more, and thus be more useful to our fellow men. Make us hungry for Thy spirit and Thy power. Let Thy grace come upon us, that the will of our God may be known to us and done through us.

Let us not break faith with any of yesterday's promises, nor leave unrepaired any of yesterday's wrongs. Show us what we can do to make this world a better place for men to live in, that the down payment made by 300,000 of our men may not have been made in vain.

May the urgency of the world's need remind us that promises do not feed the hungry, nor resolutions give them shelter. May we be willing to act when Thou shalt show us what to do. We join our hearts in this prayer for Thy guidance. In the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. WHITE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, February 14, 1947, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

"To the Congress and the Department of State of the United States:

"Your memorialist respectfully represents:

"The mining of copper is one of Arizona's chief industries—an industry so great that in point of copper production Arizona leads all of the States of the United States, and, in fact, is responsible for approximately 40 percent of all copper mined in the Nation.

"The copper-mining industry gives employment to many thousands of miners, artisans, mechanics, and craftsmen whose welfare and prosperity is in very large measure dependent upon this major activity—indeed, the economic welfare of the State is vitally affected by the status of the mining industry.

"There are, in addition to the properties now being worked, great areas and bodies of copper ore in the State which are susceptible of development, to the enrichment of the State and the Nation.

"It is, therefore, of major importance that the price of copper be maintained on a basis which will insure normal production, fair profits, steady employment, and a good standard of living for workers in the industry, and continuation of the benefits which accrue to the State's economy by reason of the industry.

"This can only be insured through the medium of an adequate import tax on raw copper to equalize the difference between the cost of producing the metal in this country and in the copper-producing countries of South America, Africa, and elsewhere.

"Wherefore your memorialist, the Legislature of the State of Arizona, urgently requests:

"1. That the protection at present afforded to copper mining in the United States be maintained."

By Mr. THOMAS of Utah:

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Utah; to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"House Joint Memorial 1

"Memorial to the President of the United States and to the Congress of the United States urging the Congress to enact, and the President to approve, legislation authorizing and directing the Treasury of the United States to coin half dollars in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the coming of the Mormon pioneers to Salt Lake Valley

"Whereas the State of Utah, during the year 1947, is holding a centennial exposition and celebration in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the coming of the Mormon pioneers to Salt Lake Valley on July 24, 1847, and to portray fittingly the natural resources and scenic wonders of Utah, prehistoric culture of the west, the development of irrigation, farming, mining, forestry, transportation, culture and the arts; and

"Whereas the State of Utah has extended to all peoples of the United States and of the world an invitation to visit Utah and to participate with the people of Utah in their centennial celebration; and

"Whereas the State of Utah has provided extensively for entertainment and programs throughout the year 1947 to appropriately carry out the purposes of such centennial observance; and,

"Whereas the occasion is of such great interest and importance to the people of the State of Utah and of the United States as to warrant the coinage of an appropriate memorial United States coin: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Utah, That the Legislature of the State of Utah does hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States to enact, and the President of the United States to approve, legislation authorizing and directing the Treasury of the United States to coin 200,000 half dollars, having a design appropriate to the commemoration of the centennial observance of the coming of the Mormon pioneers into Salt Lake Valley on July 24, 1847; that by such legislation to be enacted the United States Treasury be directed to permit the State of Utah, through the Utah Centennial Commission, to purchase all of said coins at their face value and to sell the same at such price as said commission shall determine proper, in furtherance of the Utah Centennial Celebration, be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States and to all members of the congressional delegation from the State of Utah."

Two concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of South Dakota; to the Committee on Finance:

"House Concurrent Resolution 3

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States of America to discontinue the Federal gasoline tax and Federal lubricating-oil tax as soon as possible and refuse to reenact such taxes

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the thirtieth legislative session of the State of South Dakota (the Senate concurring):

"Whereas the Congress of the United States did during the session of the Seventy-sixth Congress increase the Federal gasoline tax one-half cent per gallon, making such tax now a total of 1½ cents per gallon, despite the fact that every State in the Union now imposes a sales tax on gasoline averaging in excess of 4 cents per gallon; and

"Whereas such Federal gasoline tax during the past calendar year of 1946 has taken from the people of the State of South Dakota in excess of $3,000,000, which largely comes from the producers and from agriculture of South Dakota; and

"Whereas such tax at 1½ cents per gallon amounts to a 10-percent retail sales tax on such product which is a necessity of the residents of this State; and

"Whereas the Federal lubricating-oil tax is 6 cents per gallon, and is likewise an enormous retail sales tax upon a product necessary to the production of food for the country, and is an unfair and unreasonable imposition upon such necessity; and

"Whereas it is the sense of this legislature that it is inequitable and unfair to impose such an enormous sales tax upon a single commodity of this type which is a necessity to persons engaged in agriculture and producing pursuits; and

"Whereas such gasoline tax is a revenue measure peculiarly adapted for the individual States for the purpose of construction and maintenance of adequate highway systems and means of transportation, and administrative machinery is well established in every State in the Union: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States should discontinue the Federal gasoline tax and Federal lubricating-oil tax at the earliest possible time, and should refuse to reenact the same upon their expiration, and should thus leave the field of revenue entirely to the individual States for use in construction and maintenance of the various States highway systems; be it further

"Resolved, That the Members of the Congress of the United States from the State of South Dakota be, and they are hereby urged by the legislature of this State to use their best efforts in opposing the reenactment or continuance of said taxes; be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be forwarded by the Secretary of State to each Senator and Representative of the State of South Dakota in the Congress of the United States and to the President pro tempore of the United States Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to be by them presented to the proper committee in Congress considering or determining such aforesaid legislation."

"House Concurrent Resolution 4

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States of America to reclaim and keep in full force and effect all Federal taxes, license fees, and regulatory measures now existing, relating to the manufacture, distribution, and sale of margarine or butter substitutes

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the thirtieth legislative session of the State of South Dakota (the Senate concurring):

"Whereas the State of South Dakota is an agricultural State and the production of butter is one of its major industries; and

"Whereas the manufacture of butter is carried on by hundreds and thousands of individual farmers, and many cooperative associations and other persons, firms, and corporations in every State in the Union while margarine is manufactured mostly by a comparatively few large corporations; and

"Whereas the existing Federal statutes imposing taxes and license fees on the manufacture, distribution, and sale of margarine, together with the regulations and restrictions contained in said Federal statutes, are now, and have in the past operated effectively and efficiently, in the protection of the public against deception and fraud and in the protection of the butter industry; and

"Whereas the return of normal conditions will again find the Nation flooded with imported fats and oils which are used in the production of margarine and thereby threaten the home markets for butterfat and other domestic fats and oils: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States should not eliminate any of said existing Federal taxes, license fees, regulations, or restrictions imposed on the manufacture, distribution, and sale of margarine or butter substitutes; be it further

"Resolved, That the Members of the Congress of the United States from the State of South Dakota be, and they are hereby urged by the legislature of this State to use their best efforts in opposing any suggested elimination of any such taxes, license fees, or regulations or restrictions; be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of state to each Senator and Representative of the State of South Dakota in the Congress of the United States and to the Presiding Officer of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to be by them presented to the proper committee in Congress considering or determining such aforesaid legislation"

(The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate two concurrent resolutions identical with the foregoing, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.)

By Mr. MURRAY:

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"House Joint Memorial 1

"Memorial to the Congress of the United States of America, to the Secretary of Agriculture, and to the Director of the Federal Housing Administration, requesting the continuance and extension of the access road program for the national forests and that sufficient funds be appropriated and allotted therefor

"To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

"Whereas there now exists a serious bottleneck in Montana lumber production of saw timber because of an inadequate supply of logs made available to the small sawmill operators of the State of Montana; most of the useful and accessible timber within the State has been cut, and access to the stands of timber, remaining in the mountains within the boundaries of the national forest, through the building of truck roads is the only way to maintain the log supply for the next 20 or 30 years; and

"Whereas stands of virgin timber within the boundaries of the national forests contain wholly mature and overmature trees, the cutting of which would benefit future growth; all merchantable stands of timber within the national forests should be made accessible by a system of permanent roads in order that there may be frequent cuttings for the sake of increased forest growth; and

"Whereas the continuance of the program for construction of access roads will facilitate the advancement of such worthy projects which will benefit the people of the State of Montana and the public generally, as (1) the protection of the forests from fire, (2) the handling of livestock grazing in the national forests, (3) the use of the forests for recreational purposes, (4) the development of water resources within the forests, and (5) increased production of sawed timber available for housing: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the Thirtieth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, the senate of said assembly concurring, does most respectfully urge the Congress of the United States that the said Congress cause necessary action to be initiated by the various administering departments and make the necessary appropriations to provide for the continuance and extension of the construction of access truck roads to make accessible to the sawmill operators and the people of the State of Montana generally, useful stands of timber within the boundaries of the national forests, for the purposes aforementioned; be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State of the State of Montana be authorized, and he is hereby directed, to immediately forward copies of this memorial to the Honorable Clinton P. Anderson, Secretary of Agriculture; to the Honorable Raymond Foley, Director of the Federal Housing Administration; to the Honorable JAMES E. MURRAY and the Honorable ZALES N. ECTON, United States Senators; to the Honorable WESLEY A. D'EWART and the Honorable MIKE MANSFIELD, United States Representatives in Congress for the State of Montana; and to the resolution committee for the annual convention of the Montana Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union.

"Approved February 3, 1947.

By Mr. CORDON:

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon; to the Committee on Public Works:

"House Joint Memorial 6

"We, your memorialists, the Forty-fourth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, convened in regular session, respectfully request and petition as follows, to wit:

"Whereas Oregon and the Pacific Northwest, with the aid of low-cost power, took rapid strides toward industrial development before and during the war and have retained and expanded those advances during the postwar period; and

"Whereas the only source of low-cost power in Oregon and the Pacific Northwest in quantities adequate for their development is the energy in our rivers which can be converted to hydroelectric power; and

"Whereas the Federal Government, by numerous acts of Congress, has assumed the responsibility for development of this hydroelectric power through the construction of an integrated system of Federal multiple-purpose projects on the Columbia River and its tributaries; and

"Whereas your memorialists are advised that Congress has under consideration not only curtailment of the construction program for Federal multiple-purpose projects in the Columbia Basin but also an increase in the power rates of the Bonneville Power Administration on the grounds that those rates are inadequate to meet the repayments of construction costs required by law; and

"Whereas existing generating capacity in the Pacific Northwest is now fully utilized and reliable estimates of future power requirements of the States of Oregon and Washington indicate that installation within the next 7 years of about 1,500,000 kilowatts of new Federal generating capacity over and above that now ordered is essential to maintain continued industrial, agricultural, and utility development; and

"Whereas official reports of the Bonneville Power Administration and independent audits of its operations by certified public accountants show conclusively that power revenues under existing rate schedules are more than sufficient to meet all repayment obligations required by law in connection with the Bonneville Dam project and the Columbia Basin project: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the Senate jointly concurring therein), That your memorialists hereby respectfully petition and memorialize the Congress of the United States to make on an annual and continuing basis the appropriations necessary for providing urgently needed additional Federal generating capacity in the Columbia Basin and not to require any increase in the power rates of the Bonneville Power Administration which would destroy the key of low-cost hydroelectric power needed to unlock other natural resources in Oregon and the great Pacific Northwest, permitting the development of new opportunities and new jobs and the creation of new taxable wealth; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Oregon be authorized, and is hereby directed, to forward immediately certified copies of this joint memorial to the President of the United States, the President pro tempore of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, the Members of the congressional delegation from the States of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana, and the presiding officers of the legislative bodies of the last three named States."

FARM CROP SURPLUS

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from C. E. Darr and Willard Hartley, of Lincoln, Nebr., with reference to the prospects of farm-crop surplus in 1947.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LINCOLN, NEBR., February 6, 1947.

DEAR SENATOR BUTLER: We hear worry expressed every now and then about the prospects of farm-crop surplus in 1947.

We would think that no surplus possibly resulting from initiating enough of everything to make sure of plenty of everything could possibly produce more (of the relatively nonperishable products) than it would be just as well for the Government to give loans on. In fact, in the light of our experience in World War II, and with military men figuring on our probably being attacked first in another war, it looks as if at least 2 years' crop carry-over is not too much.

Also, it would just about do away with the "corn-hog cycle" though we sense that a graded system of loan prices might be necessary for the last half of the 2 years—something like that practiced by the milk cooperative here before Pearl Harbor.

We write you partly because you have been a grainman and partly because we do not know what committee or authority it would be sent to. Unless you know that such authorities keep these considerations fully in mind, we hope you will pass this on to them.

Yours respectfully,

C. E. DARR.
WILLARD HARTLEY.

PROTEST AGAINST FEDERAL FUNDS FOR PURCHASE OF CERTAIN PAINTINGS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter I have received from Murray M. Gilkeson, of El Dorado, Kans., in which he protests against the expenditure by the State Department of $41,000 Federal funds for the purchase of a certain group of paintings for display in Europe and Latin America.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EL DORADO, KANS., February 7, 1947.
The Honorable ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to a group of pictures on pages 80 and 81 of the Look magazine of February 18, 1947. The article states that the State Department has purchased these pictures for display in Europe and Latin America to give the peoples an idea of the United States.

My letter has a twofold purpose. First, a protest against the expenditure of $41,000 plus costs for transportation and display; and second, if we must display "works of art," to protest against the type of pictures selected as representative of life in the United States.

I realize that in your busy days there are many major items with which you must deal, but this question of "art" indicates that the Congress cannot permit the Department of State to be a government unto itself.

Respectfully yours,

MURRAY M. GILKESON.

COMMON TRUST FUND ACT FOR THE DISTRICT

Mr. BUCK. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for a Common Trust Fund Act in the District of Columbia. I desire to state that if this bill is enacted into law it will mark a most progressive step in local banking practices for the District of Columbia.

A common trust fund is one in which moneys belonging to various trust accounts are combined for investment purposes, and the income therefrom is distributed in proportion to the share that each of the individual trust accounts bears to the total. It is a vehicle which provides for the investment of small and moderate-sized trust funds to secure diversification of investment which would otherwise be unavailable because of their size. It also permits banking institutions to accept smaller trusts because the cost of their operation is lower. It also permits diversification in investment and provides for closer supervision and a more effective management of investments for smaller trusts.

The present bill has been endorsed by the Bar Association of the District of Columbia and the District of Columbia Bankers' Association. It has also been promulgated by the committee on uniform State laws of the American Bar Association. Similar uniform legislation has been enacted in 8 States, and 17 other States have similar legislation, including my own State of Delaware. The Equitable Trust Co., of Wilmington, Del., has the distinction of being the first bank in the United States to have a common trust fund certified under Federal Reserve regulations, and as an officer of this trust company I can report that the advantages derived from our common trust fund have been most gratifying.

The bill (S. 629) concerning common trust funds and to make uniform the law with reference thereto, introduced by Mr. BUCK, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENT OF SUBSISTENCE EXPENSE ACT OF 1926—AMENDMENT

Mr. AIKEN submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 544) to further amend section 3 of the Subsistence Expense Act of 1926, as amended, which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, on January 6 last the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] introduced Senate bill 6, to provide for censuses of manufacturers, mineral industries, business and distribution, and transportation. The bill was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It is my understanding that under the reorganization act of 1946 all proposed legislation relating to censuses and the collection of statistics generally should be referred to the Committee on Civil Service. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 6 and that it be referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair the reference suggested by the Senator from Maine is the correct one, and, without further objection, the order for a change of reference is made.

INDEFINITE POSTPONEMENT OF SENATE BILL 332

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 332, to provide for the registration of certain firearms, the taxation of the transfers thereof, and for other purposes, and that the bill be indefinitely postponed. The bill was introduced by me at the request of the Attorney General. I ask unanimous consent that a statement explanatory of the request I am now making be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Committee on Finance will be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 332, the bill will be indefinitely postponed, and the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY ON BILL S. 332

A. Origin of bill: My purpose in asking for the withdrawal of the bill is merely a parliamentary one. On January 24, I introduced the bill at the Attorney General's request. The bill had been drafted in the Department of Justice. The Attorney General indicated that he expected the bill to go to the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I am honored to serve as chairman. But since the measure involved taxation on transfer of firearms, it went instead to the Committee on Finance. In addition, since it was a taxation measure, its initial consideration would have to take place in the House of Representatives anyway. Thus, a representative for the Department of Justice has told me that the Department had erred in referring the bill to my attention originally.

Since the Judiciary Committee has no connection now with the measure, I am withdrawing the bill. I feel that the courtesy of a committee chairman in introducing bills at the request of an agency head need not extend to introducing bills to which the committee chairman may be opposed and which do not even lie within his committee's jurisdiction. It has been suggested, too, that orderly congressional procedure is upset when a committee chairman introduces bills at the request of any agency head which lie within another committee's jurisdiction.

On January 24 I stated that the matter of crime prevention deserved consideration because of its importance to our country. I noted that the law-abiding sportsmen throughout our land are keenly interested in crime prevention, and I asked only that S. 332 be considered. I stated at that time that I was definitely not committed to the bill.

B. Views on bill: From the outset, my fundamental sympathies have actually been opposed to the regimentation and abuses which might arise out of this bill. I am opposed to the building up of any more Government bureaucracy. I am opposed to nuisance restrictions on our citizenry. I am opposed to needless controls on outdoor sports, which are, of course, so wholesome and well loved by countless Americans, and particularly by the scores of thousands of sportsmen in my own State—a hunting paradise.

C. Withdrawal action: In view of these facts, (a) that the parliamentary reason for my introduction of the bill has been eliminated by the referral of the bill to the Finance Committee, (b) that I am opposed to the abuses which might arise out of the bill, I am asking for its withdrawal.

I am still desirous of helping to prevent crime by any legitimate means, but I seriously question whether this bill would accomplish that purpose.

D. Hunting encouragement: I have always sought to help America's great hunting industry rather than to hurt it. Right now I am awaiting a response from the Secretary of Commerce to a letter I addressed to him a short time ago on ways and means by which the Congress might stimulate outdoor sports. As a means of recreation and health, as a means of encouraging qualities of sportsmanship, as a means of tourist attraction, and other purposes, the hunting industry is vital to America as a whole and to innumerable States.

WORLD TRADE IN AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. CAPPER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 83), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Whereas the United States is entering into a period of postwar reconstruction of its channels of foreign trade; and

Whereas the Congress and the people of the United States of America must consider carefully what policies it is necessary to adopt in order best to promote the peace and the prosperity of the United States and of the world through expanding trade; and

Whereas the interests of farmers and of business are vitally concerned in the policies and arrangements affecting agricultural products in foreign trade; and

Whereas comprehensive knowledge of foreign competition with and demand for agricultural products, and of the policies of other governments affecting production and trade in agricultural products, is basic to formulation of policies in this field beneficial to the interests of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby requested to prepare as soon as possible for the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate a study covering the following matter:

1. An analysis of the current proposals for international machinery designed to expand world trade in agricultural products, together with an appraisal of the effect on American agriculture of previous reciprocal trade agreements.

2. A factual statement of the policies and practices of other countries with respect to agricultural production, trade, and consumption, which are significant to the foreign trade of the United States in agricultural products.

3. A statistical report on the world production of and trade in agricultural products in which the United States is significantly interested as importer or exporter.

4. An analysis showing what imports may be expanded to the benefit of the United States farmers without disrupting our domestic economy.

MARY SHEARIN PERRY

Mr. HOEY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 84), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to Mary Shearin Perry, widow of John R. Perry, late an employee of the Senate, a sum equal to 1 year's compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

INVESTIGATION OF PROCEDURES IN RETIREMENT OF CERTAIN COMMISSIONED OFFICERS

Mr. CORDON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 85) which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Armed Services, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation with respect to the procedures followed by the War Department and the Navy Department in the retirement for physical disability, and the determination of the entitlement to retirement pay for physical disability, of commissioned officers of the Army of the United States, the United States Navy, and the United States Marine Corps. Such study and investigation shall be conducted for the purpose of determining whether the procedures followed result in any discrimination between the commissioned officers of the regular components of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps and the commissioned officers of other components of such services.

SEC. 2. The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of its investigation together with such recommendations as to necessary legislation as it may deem desirable.

THE SCHOOL-LUNCH PROGRAM

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the school-lunch program throughout the country is in serious danger of being drastically curtailed and in view of reports that appropriations for the school-lunch program may be greatly reduced, if not eliminated entirely, in the legislative budget program, I should like to bring to the attention of the Congress some facts concerning the seriousness of this problem by making available data from the Secretary of Agriculture showing the present status of school-lunch operations, the increase in participation, and the need for the program. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks a table submitted by the Secretary of Agriculture relating to this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the order is made.

The table submitted by Mr. AIKEN is as follows:

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD the text of a press release issued by the Department of State, announcing the appointment of Mr. Durward V. Sandifer as acting legislative counsel for the Department.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Department of State announces the appointment of Mr. Durward V. Sandifer as acting legislative counsel for the Department. His office will be attached to that of the Department's legal adviser, Mr. Charles Fahy.

As legislative counsel, Mr. Sandifer will provide legal guidance to various offices and divisions in the Department concerned with legislative action and will assist in the preparation of proposed legislation and coordinate its presentation to the Congress. His office will be responsible within the Department for the coordination of reports, comments, expressions of opinion, and communications to Congress, concerning proposed legislation, treaties, and conventions.

Mr. Sandifer has a long background of private and public experience in the field of international law and relations and international organization. He came to the Department of State in 1934 as assistant to the legal adviser. He was assigned to the Department of State's work on postwar problems early in 1942 as a specialist on international law and organization. Since that time he has been closely associated with the Department's work on international organization, particularly the development and establishment of the United Nations. He has been, since 1944, Chief of the Division of International Organization Affairs.

Mr. Sandifer was technical expert on the United States delegation to the Dumbarton Oaks Conference, and was secretary-general and chief technical expert of the United States delegation to the San Francisco Conference on International Organization. He attended the London sessions of the general assembly as an adviser to the United States delegation. He was an adviser at the first and second sessions of the Economic and Social Council. Most recently he has served as delegate to the World Health Conference in New York and as principal adviser of the United States delegation to the general assembly in New York.

Mr. Sandifer is a member of the bar of the District of Columbia and of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed. The calendar under rule VIII is in order. The clerk will call the first bill on the calendar.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 27) to provide for suspending the enforcement of certain obligations against the operators of gold and silver mines who are forced to cease operations because of the war was announced as first in order.

Mr. WHITE. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 1030) to continue in effect certain war excise tax rates, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHITE. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Over, on objection.

The bill (H. R. 1353) to amend the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHITE. I ask that the bill be passed over temporarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ERADICATION OF FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE

The bill (S. 568) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with other American countries in control and eradication of foot-and-mouth disease and rinderpest was announced as next in order.

Mr. MORSE. May we have an explanation of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An explanation of the bill is requested by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BUSHFIELD. Mr. President, the foot-and-mouth disease has broken out in the Republic of Mexico. The Department of Agriculture, at the request of the Mexican authorities, has been sending technical men to Mexico to assist and cooperate with the Republic of Mexico in an attempt to eradicate it. Already the disease, which has been discovered in Mexico only in the last 40 days, has covered an area of 300 miles by 150 miles. It is extremely important that quick action be taken on the pending bill, and I ask the Senate to pass it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I should like to know what the bill proposes to do.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I have not with me any of the material relating to the bill, but the bill proposes to give our Department of Agriculture authority to cooperate with the Mexican authorities, as the Senator from South Dakota has said, in stamping out the foot-and-mouth disease before it gets into the United States. As the Senator from South Dakota has indicated, the outbreak in Mexico now covers an area of some 45,000 square miles. The Mexican authorities would welcome the cooperation of the technicians of our Department of Agriculture. If this disease once gets into the United States, no one can foretell how many million cattle might have to be slaughtered. At present it is hoped that it can be controlled by cooperation between our technical men and the Mexican authorities. As I understand, the bill carries no appropriation whatsoever, and if any appropriation is needed it will be necessary for the Department to come to Congress and get it.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Was there any evidence produced before the committee showing that any cattle having the foot-and-mouth disease have been shipped into this country from Mexico?

Mr. AIKEN. As I understand, no evidence of the disease has been found in any of the cattle which have been shipped into this country so far, and at the present time the disease is confined to the lower part of Mexico, and is not present in the States along the United States border.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to make it clear that I am very anxious that the Department of Agriculture do all it can to eradicate the foot-and-mouth disease in the Republic of Mexico. The area now contaminated is larger than the State of Oregon. I am perfectly willing to go along with the bill, but I do not think it goes nearly far enough. I think we must recognize that the emergency facing the livestock industry of this country is very great.

I have on my desk in my office a report which I have secured regarding this matter. I did not bring it with me this morning because I did not know this bill would come up today. The report is one I received from the War Department in regard to experimentation which was conducted in Germany during the war with the objective of eradicating the foot-and-mouth disease by vaccination. If the report presents an actual picture, the results have been remarkable.

We know what happened in California in 1929 when it became necessary for Government authorities to go into a large California county and kill every cleft-hoofed animal, at tremendous cost to the Government. If the spending of a few million dollars in Mexico by way of a vaccination procedure as a preventive will help stem the spread of this disease, then the agents of the Department of Agriculture should proceed into Mexico with vaccination needles at the earliest possible moment.

I understood it would cost probably $2,000,000 to vaccinate the animals in the affected area in Mexico. My only information as to the efficacy of vaccination is the report to which I have referred, and I do not know how reliable vaccination is as a preventive; but if it will accomplish what we anticipate, then I am for an appropriation to enable the Department of Agriculture to try the vaccination method.

Mr. President, this is a threat we cannot trifle with. Prevention of this disease is so vital to the great livestock industry of this country that we had better forget about the border between Mexico and the United States, insofar as spending American dollars is concerned, and see to it that our Department of Agriculture has available to it whatever funds may be required to stamp out this horrible disease in Mexico before it ever gets over the border. That is the only reason I raise the question.

I merely want to have the RECORD show that I think the passage of this bill alone may not be sufficient—I hope it will be—but I think the Department of Agriculture ought to be given assurance of a great interest on the part of the Senate in this very serious problem which confronts our livestock industry. I, for one, think that an immediate investigation should be made as to the advisability of proceeding with a vaccination program of the herds in Mexico that are affected by this disease. I say that subject to a careful check by the Department of Agriculture into the report on the German vaccination method to which I have referred.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. I merely wanted to raise my voice in corroboration of what the Senator from Oregon has just said.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, did I lose the floor by yielding to the Senator from Oregon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. AIKEN. I am almost ready to yield the floor, if the Senator from New Mexico, who now has it by recognition of the Chair, is willing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield?

Mr. HATCH. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I desire to say a few words more. The Senator from Oregon may be entirely correct in saying that this bill does not go far enough, but in this matter time seems to be of the essence now, and it appears to me that this proposed legislation should be enacted today, whether it goes far enough or not, because it will in effect wipe out the boundary between the United States and Mexico so far as our technicians are concerned.

I sincerely hope we shall not have to spend huge sums of money in eradicating this disease, but if we have to do it, it is better to spend it in southern Mexico than it is to have to spend a hundred times as much all over the United States.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I had merely started to say that there has been a great deal of misunderstanding about the foot-and-mouth disease in this country. People have not taken it seriously. They have thought that Senators from the West were raising a question about a matter which was not of serious importance.

I was gratified recently to read a very able article in Life magazine, giving the history of this disease. I wish every Senator would read it.

I agree with the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Vermont that the bill does not go far enough, but I certainly think we should take this one short step today.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, this bill (S. 568) was introduced by the chairman of the Agricultural Committee, as I understand, after investigation through a subcommittee and after conference with the Secretary of Agriculture. I further understand that the bill embodies proposed legislation suggested by the Secretary of Agriculture to authorize the Department of Agriculture to enter upon a program of sending technicians into Mexico there making an examination, and cooperating with Mexican authorities in an effort to control and eradicate the foot-and-mouth disease. I should like to say that I think this matter has been taken care of expeditiously by the subcommittee which, I am quite sure, considered the resolution asking for this authority submitted by me some weeks ago. I think the authority granted by the bill is all the Secretary of Agriculture feels he needs now.

The resolution submitted by me to which I have referred is known as Senate Resolution 72, and I ask unanimous consent to have the resolution printed at the end of my remarks. I may say that I for one am perfectly satisfied with the progress that is being made by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in this matter, and I am satisfied that when the technicians submit their report they will suggest, if need be, further legislation which I think will be in keeping with the advice and recommendations of the Department of Agriculture and with the efficient and effective handling of this unfortunate situation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution referred to by the Senator from Nebraska will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution (S. Res. 72) submitted by Mr. WHERRY on January 27, 1947, is as follows:

Whereas an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease occurred in Mexico several weeks ago and has already spread to some 10 States in the vicinity of Mexico City and Vera Cruz; and

Whereas if this disease should spread to the large cattle-raising States in northern Mexico, it would not be possible to prevent its further spread to the United States; and

Whereas the rapid spread of the disease makes prompt cooperative action on the part of the United States imperative, if the disease is to be stamped out in Mexico; and

Whereas officials of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the United States Department of Agriculture trained in combating the disease have already conducted a careful study of the situation in Mexico, and their report as to what action should be taken is expected to be submitted within a very few days: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed, upon receipt of the forthcoming report of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture concerning the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Mexico, (1) to make an immediate study of such report and any recommendations contained therein, (2) to make such further studies as it may deem necessary concerning the subject matter of such report, (3) to report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of such study, together with such recommendations as it may deem desirable.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I am sure that many Senators realize the importance of this measure, and also realize the threat and the danger from the foot-and-mouth disease. In my State we had an experience with an outbreak of this disease a good many years ago. As I now recall the only method on earth of eradicating it is the destruction of the herds, and I think the burning of the bodies or their burial in the earth.

This outbreak in Mexico resulted from the importation of a number of bulls from Brazil. It is prevalent in a number of the states of Mexico in the southern part of the Republic. It is believed, however, that through the assistance of the Secretary of Agriculture, who has, by the way, a very capable staff engaged in combating the diseases of livestock, it can be kept in the southern states of Mexico and not allowed to approach the boundaries of the United States. If it should spread across the Rio Grande, cattlemen in that area would be faced with a very great crisis. They are very much alarmed, and I have many appeals about this matter. I have had a number of consultations with the Secretary of Agriculture, and he is perfectly willing to undertake this work to the extent that Congress may authorize it.

While the pending bill may not be all that is desired, it is still a start in the right direction. I hope and trust that the Senate will not hesitate to pass the measure and give the Secretary of Agriculture authority to cooperate with the Mexican officials so as to stimulate and arouse within them a desire to take the necessary action for the extermination of this disease.

Mr. BUSHFIELD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is proceeding under rule VIII, which permits a Senator to speak only once, and not longer than 5 minutes. Is there objection to the Senator from South Dakota being recognized in spite of the rule? The Senator is recognized.

Mr. BUSHFIELD. Mr. President, the subcommittee has had several hearings on this very important matter. The Secretary of Agriculture has met with it, and he has asked for an authorization to be granted him to carry out the provisions of this bill. I cannot insist too strongly that time is of the essence in this matter. We must act quickly.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I do not really see how we could go any further than we have gone, with the evidence we had before us. Senators must not overlook the problem that we face. In dealing with this situation we are asking that our representative go into a foreign country and seek its aid in combating a disease that is now prevailing within its bounds and which in turn may affect us. We do not know what the attitude of the Mexican Government is going to be. We are very hopeful that it will work with us.

The bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make any expenditures from funds appropriated hereunder, or adopt any method or measure found by him to be required, in accomplishing the purpose of the act. Now what is the purpose of the bill? I quote from it:

The Secretary is authorized to cooperate with any other American country in the control and eradication of foot-and-mouth disease and rinderpest in such country where he deems such control necessary to protect the livestock and related industries of the United States.

If the Secretary of Agriculture should make an agreement with the Department of Agriculture in Mexico, let us say, to destroy affected cattle, or if he attains consent to vaccinate all the cattle in certain areas of Mexico, he is empowered to spend funds for such purposes. Under section 4 of the pending measure the Congress would be bound, as I see it, to appropriate a sufficient sum of money to carry out the program entered into by the Secretary. Section 4 reads, partly, as follows:

There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out this act.

No, Mr. President; I really believe that the Congress today is going as far as it can reasonably be expected to go and my hope is that it will enact this measure without undue delay.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 568) was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill as passed is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with any other American country in the control and eradication of emergency outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease and rinderpest in such country where he deems such control or eradication necessary to protect the livestock and related industries of the United States. Arrangements for the cooperation authorized by this act shall be made through and in consultation with the Secretary of State.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make any expenditure from funds appropriated hereunder or adopt any method or measure found by him to be required in accomplishing the purposes of this act.

SEC. 3. Funds appropriated hereunder may also be used, without employing the authorization in section 2, for the purchase or hire of passenger motor vehicles and aircraft, printing and binding without regard to the act of March 1, 1919 (44 U. S. C. 111), and personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere without regard to the limitation contained in section 14 (a) of the Federal Employees Pay Act of 1946. Where necessary to control or eradicate such diseases, the Secretary or his designated representative may authorize employees of the Department of Agriculture to accept from the interested country appointments without compensation or with nominal compensation.

SEC. 4. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out this act. The authority contained in this act is in addition to and not in substitution for the authority of existing law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That concludes the calendar.

AMENDMENT OF THE NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE ACT OF 1940

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 1353, to amend the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the bill by title for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 1353) to amend the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado subsequently said: Mr. President, a few moments ago, during the call of the calendar, House bill 1353 was considered and passed. I was not then able to be on the floor of the Senate. I recently had communication with the Army Times with respect to some of the provisions of the bill. In order to clarify some of the points which they raised, I took up the matter with General Bradley; and I have since received his reply. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, following the passage of House bill 1353, the letter from the Army Times and the reply from General Bradley. His reply explains some of the points covered in the bill.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARMY TIMES,
Washington, D. C., January 29, 1947.

Hon. EDWIN C. JOHNSON,
Senate Finance Committee, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The editors of Army Times respectfully urge your committee to examine with care the provisions of H. R. 1353 which the House of Representatives passed today without debate.

Purporting to extend the time for reinstatement of lapsed GI insurance policies, the bill, in fact, abandons important safeguards given the veteran by Congress in the past.

You will recall that similar hasty and ill-considered action by Congress and the Veterans' Administration last August resulted in enactment of the unjust and unnecessary on-the-job ceiling law—a law which may be repealed by the Eightieth Congress.

Over 10,000 veterans of World War II whose GI insurance has been permitted to lapse will be affected by H. R. 1353.

H. R. 1353 was introduced in Congress by Mrs. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS (Republican, Massachusetts), chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, at the request of the Veterans' Administration. The hasty action was decided upon in a move to beat the existing February 1 dead line for reinstating lapsed policies without physical examination.

However, in their eagerness to approve a bill believed to be of benefit to millions of veterans whose insurance has lapsed, the House Members passed a bill which goes far beyond the original purpose of merely extending the dead line.

Section 3 of the bill repeals subsections (y) (1) and (y) (2) of section 602 of the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended. These subsections contain important safeguards for the veteran.

General Bradley requested their repeal in order that the dead-line date for reinstatement could be advanced to August 1, 1947, despite the fact that they contain basic guaranties governing the reinstatement of term insurance, and their repeal will give the Veterans' Administration exclusive authority over future reinstatement provisions.

The Rogers bill, by itself, does not extend the dead-line date for reinstatement. It merely repeals all provisions of the National Service Life Insurance Act concerning reinstatement, and gives the Veterans' Administration carte blanche in the future.

Subsection (y) (1) provides that a term policy can be reinstated any time during its term upon the payment of two premiums and submission of evidence of good health. If this subsection is repealed the VA hereafter will be able to require the payment of all premiums in arrears.

Subsection (y) (2) provides that a term policy may be reinstated within 6 months of the date of the enactment of the amendatory act, which is February 1, or within 6 months of the date of the lapse upon a comparative health statement.

General Bradley already has stated that 6 months is too long and that after August 1, 1947, he will require by regulation that NSLI policies be reinstated only within 3 months upon a comparative health statement.

Veterans whose policies lapse after August 1 and are not reinstated within 3 months, under the Rogers bill, could be required to take physical examinations.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD G. STAGG,
Editor.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., February 7, 1947.

Hon. EDWIN C. JOHNSON,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR JOHNSON: In accordance with your request I am glad of the opportunity to submit the following statement in respect to the letter of January 29, 1947, addressed to you by the editor of the Army Times concerning the repeal of (y) (1) and (2) of section 602 of the National Service Life Insurance Act, as amended.

Prior to the passage on August 1, 1946, of the Insurance Act of 1946 reinstatement of both term and converted national service life insurance was regulated by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs under the power given him by section 608 of the National Service Life Insurance Act. The regulations governing term insurance in effect at the time the law was amended were in substance the same as section 602 (y) (1) and (2), except that the delimiting date for reinstatement on a comparative health basis was January 1, 1947, whereas the amendment made it 6 months from the date of the legislation. However, as section (y) (1) and (2) has to do only with term insurance the reinstatement conditions applicable to the permanent plans of insurance continued to be subject to regulation by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs under the authority bestowed upon him by section 608 of the National Service Life Insurance Act.

Since there is even greater need for flexibility in prescribing reinstatement conditions for term insurance than there is for permanent insurance the advisability of providing the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs with the same authority for regulating the reinstatement of term insurance as he now has in regard to permanent insurance must be readily apparent. The administration of life insurance must remain dynamic if it is to be properly administered since one of its fundamentals is the capitalizing of experience. May I observe that this is demonstrated by the need for now amending the law so as to allow the extending of the February 1 delimiting date. As it is not beyond the realm of possibility that such occasions may arise in the future, I believe it essential that the law provide sufficient authority to meet circumstances as they appear.

The regulations, the essence of which was enacted to apply to term insurance, were not intended to be permanent but rather were promulgated for the specific purpose of meeting an emergency. Following the passage of the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, regulations were issued which required as a condition precedent to reinstatement that all back premiums be paid and that the applicant show good health. Later there was introduced a provision which permitted the acceptance of applications made within 3 months immediately following lapse upon a showing that the applicant was in as good health when seeking reinstatement as he was at the time of lapse. As a temporary measure in 1943 the period during which a showing of comparative health would be acceptable was lengthened to 6 months. In 1944, the regulations were further modified so as to require the payment of only two monthly premiums in connection with the reinstatement of term insurance. Such changes, dictated by expediency, were occasioned by the inability of the Veterans' Administration uniformly to supply within a 3-month period information to persons whose policies had lapsed. The cited modifications would seem further to indicate the advantage of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs having jurisdiction over reinstatement requirements so as to meet exigencies.

If H. R. 1353 is enacted into law, I propose to retain the two monthly premium reinstatement provision at least until October 1948, which is the earliest date that any of the term policies expire, and to extend the period for reinstatement on a comparative health basis from February 1, 1947, to August 1, 1947. In the event I should find it necessary thereafter in the interest of the equitable treatment of all policyholders to require the payment of all premiums for reinstatement of term policies, may I point out that those veterans who served between October 8, 1940, and September 2, 1945, both dates inclusive, have an opportunity under the present law, if in good health, to acquire new insurance without the payment of any back premiums. Moreover, up to January 1, 1950, if the only disability barring their procuring such insurance was caused by active duty, such applications are acceptable provided the applicant is not totally disabled.

The Veterans' Administration is now in the course of conducting an informational program on a Nation-wide basis with the object of informing all veterans of their rights to national service life insurance so that by August 1, 1947, it may be reasonably expected that they will have had an opportunity of becoming informed as to their privileges in regard to national service life insurance. Also the service rendered veterans on insurance matters is now beginning progressively to improve so that I believe that by August 1, 1947, it should be generally satisfactory. However, should the situation on August 1, 1947, for some unforeseen reason be such that the procedure for notifying veterans as to the lapse of their policies be not operating sufficiently well so as to afford ample opportunity for reinstatement within the 3-month period I would then not hesitate to again move forward the delimiting date for reinstatement upon a comparative health showing. It is contemplated that beyond the proposed delimiting date reinstatement will be approved when application is made within 3 months following the date of lapse and the applicant is shown to be in as good health as on the date of lapse. After the expiration of such 3-month period a showing of good health would be required. In this connection it is to be observed that the 3-month comparative health period is uniquely liberal as compared to the requirements of other insurers, who usually permit reinstatement only upon a showing of insurability in line with their standards for granting insurance initially.

While I am anxious to be liberal in permitting persons to reinstate their national service life insurance I cannot lose sight of the fact that it is mutual insurance and that those insureds who have regularly paid their premiums are entitled to have their interests properly safeguarded since there is at least an implied promise that national service life insurance will be administered in accord with recognized and accepted insurance practices. In fact to so conduct the affairs of national service life insurance I regard as a solemn obligation. Being mutual insurance the singling out of any class for undue favor must be at the expense of the whole group and if any such practice were followed it would inevitably result in the net cost of national service life insurance becoming unduly high to those veterans who have not been advantaged over their fellow policyholders.

While the factual statements contained in Mr. Stagg's letter are self-evident from a casual perusal of the bill, the inferences which he appears to draw from them have no foundation since it is demonstrated the very object of the proposed amendment is to do equity and protect the interests of all the policyholders.

In presenting this proposed legislation to the Congress, I had the concurrence of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, the Amvets, and the American Veterans Committee.

I assure you that I shall be pleased to furnish you with any additional information you may desire.

Sincerely,

OMAR N. BRADLEY,
General, United States Army,
Administrator.

DAVID E. LILIENTHAL

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I am about to read a letter to the Senate. In reading the letter I am particularly calling its contents to the attention of my colleagues on this side of the aisle, but that does not prohibit the Senators on the other side of the aisle from listening to it, with what I think will be interest.

The letter came to me this morning. It is an unusual letter; I am told it was written by an unusual man. He comes from the great South, from the State of North Carolina. His name is Clarence Poe, and he is writing as president and editor of the Progressive Farmer, which publishes five editions throughout the South. He is vouched for by the Senator from North Carolina as a man of the highest reputation, and his paper, a representative farm magazine, is held in very high esteem in the South. The letter is as follows:

RALEIGH, N. C., February 15, 1947.

Senator CHARLES W. TOBEY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR TOBEY: I am a Democrat—but first of all I am an American.

Hence I put what will help America far, far ahead—infinitely far ahead—of what will merely help the Democratic Party.

For example, if I were thinking of myself only as a Democrat I should right now be praying Almighty God to make the Republicans commit what I sincerely believe would be one of the greatest political blunders they could possibly make as the 1948 campaign begins—defeat David Lilienthal.

The balance of power in the 1948 election will be held by men who at one time or another voted for F. D. R.—and many who earlier followed T. R. himself.

If anyone does not know who that means, I will say it means the immortal Theodore Roosevelt.

They are voters who are normally liberal, or at least not reactionary in spirit and purpose.

I know nothing that would more surely convince the great majority of such voters that the GOP is incurably a party of reaction and that its leaders put party above country than for you to defeat David Lilienthal.

He is a great American, a great administrator, a man whose chief crime is that he refused to make TVA a political grab bag for patronage hunters.

He is not only not a Communist but his brand of sanely progressive liberalism is the one sure way to keep communism out of this country. His policies have the same relationship to communism that vaccination has to smallpox—it just keeps you from getting the real thing.

If you confirm Lilienthal I shall rejoice that you have done a great thing for America. If you defeat him, I hope you will at least not envy me the mean satisfaction of knowing you have done a great thing, a very great thing for the Democratic Party in 1948.

Yours sincerely,

CLARENCE POE,
President and Editor of the Progressive Farmer.

To all of which I say "Amen."

ANNIVERSARY OF SIGNING OF LITHUANIA'S DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, February 16, 1947, is the twenty-ninth anniversary of the signing of the declaration of independence by the once proud and prosperous country of Lithuania. For years the anniversary of this event was an occasion for annual celebration not only in Lithuania but throughout many parts of the world.

The tragic betrayal of Poland has been frequently presented, and I have always joined in every protest. The American people have been aroused and have constantly manifested their deep concern over Poland's distressing plight.

On this Lithuanian anniversary we are impelled to lay bare another victim of the same ruthless forces. Lithuania at one time had a population of approximately 3,000,000 people. They had their own language, their own culture and customs, and they were sovereign in spirit and in law. Lithuania was a proud member of the once League of Nations and engaged in treaty making with her neighbors, including Russia.

Today Lithuania is no longer an independent state. She is one of the victims of aggressions of Europe and the vacillating appeasing foreign policy of the United States of America.

Russia in violation of a solemn treaty first took over the governmental affairs of Lithuania in 1940. Later the Germans liberated Lithuania from the Russians by invasion. Subsequently, with our help, the Russians liberated Lithuania from the Germans by invasion. Liberation by both Russia and Germany meant looting, rape, murder, deportation, imprisonment, and fear. The people of Lithuania saw little or no difference in the liberation by either country. They want no more liberation—they want only liberty.

These thousands of American citizens of Lithuanian descent are asking about our foreign policy. They read and they believed the Atlantic Charter and the text of the United Nations Organization, and they ask that something be done to carry out the high-sounding principles of both declarations. The Atlantic Charter provided in part:

First, their countries seek no aggrandizement, territorial or other;

Second, they desire to see no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned;

Third, they respect the right of all people to choose the form of government under which they will live, and they wish to see sovereign rights in self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them.

Certainly Lithuania falls within the category of nations who have had their sovereign rights in self-government forcibly deprived of them.

The Atlantic Charter was the result of a conference at sea between the British Prime Minister and the President of the United States in August 1941. The world was informed that Russia adhered to the basic principles of the Charter on September 24, 1941.

I would like to review the fateful events between Russia and Lithuania. Russia recognized Lithuania as an independent sovereign state and solemnly agreed and covenanted that it would respect the sovereignty of the Republic of Lithuania. On September 28, 1926, a nonaggression treaty was entered into by the Republic of Lithuania and Soviet Russia. The language of certain articles of said pact is as follows:

ART. 2. The Republic of Lithuania and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics mutually undertake to respect in all circumstances the sovereignty and territorial integrity and inviolability of each other.

ART. 3. Each of the two contracting parties undertakes to refrain from any aggressive action whatsoever against the other party.

ART. 5. Should a conflict arise, and if impossible to liquidate it in a diplomatic way, both contracting parties agree in such case to nominate conciliatory commissions.

This treaty was by its terms to be in effect until December 31, 1945.

On October 10, 1939, Lithuania and Russia entered into a mutual-assistance pact, article 7 of which reads:

The realization of this treaty must not infringe the sovereign rights of the contracting parties, especially the structure of their state, their economic and social systems, military instruments, and altogether the principles of nonintervention of one state in the internal affairs of another state.

Along with this pact, Soviet Russia demanded the right to Russian Army garrisons in Lithuania. Many political observers interpreted this Russian demand as the first step to sovietize Lithuania. On October 31, 1939, Mr. Molotov dismissed these speculations in the following words:

We stand for the conscientious and exact observation of the treaties concluded, on the principle of entire reciprocity, and declare the idle talk about the sovietization of the Baltic States to be profitable only to our common enemies and to all kinds of anti-Soviet provocateurs.

However, in June of 1940, Soviet Russia did occupy Lithuania—deposed its Government, and, under the supervision of the Russian Army, an election was held, with ballots containing only one set of names. The results of these so-called elections were announced in London fully 24 hours before the polls closed in Lithuania. The United States denounced the Soviet occupation and elections as being devious processes and predatory activities to deliberately annihilate the independence of the Baltic Republics—Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania.

On June 30, 1940, Mr. Molotov explained the Russian position as follows:

It would be unpardonable if the Soviet Union did not seize this opportunity, which may never recur. The leaders of the Soviet Union have decided to incorporate the Baltic States into the family of Soviet Republics.

The United States has never officially acceded to these Soviet claims. The State Department of the United States has continued to recognize and still recognizes the Lithuanian Minister to the United States. Its position in the matter is that Lithuania should be an independent nation.

Notwithstanding such solemn treaties, it is estimated that at least 200,000 of the people of Lithuania have been put to death, were deported, imprisoned, or are today existing as enforced laborers under the cruel domination of Russia.

In June 1941, Germany invaded Russia.

The Congress of the United States, having passed the Lend-Lease Act to provide munitions and supplies and other military aid to any country whose "defense is determined by the President to be vital to the defense of the United States," the late President dispatched his personal representative, the late Mr. Harry Hopkins, to meet with Generalissimo Stalin in Russia during July 1941. The German Army was moving fast and deep into Russian territory. Russia desperately needed assistance. Mr. Harry Hopkins, representing the President of the United States, promised, and we subsequently sent, tremendous amounts of military aid to help defend Russia, although we were not officially in the war. So far as anyone can learn, not one word was uttered at that meeting about the future liberation of the little country of Lithuania or the other Baltic states that had been so ruthlessly gobbled up by Russia a few months before.

In August 1941 the President and Prime Minister Churchill, meeting in great secrecy at sea, finally announced the laudatory declaration of principles of the Atlantic Charter. Everyone had a right to expect that the beneficiaries of the joint effort of the two great powers would include the little sovereign state of Lithuania, a tragic victim of this war.

In September 1941 Russia was still crying for greater assistance to help her beat back the German attack on Russian soil. Mr. Averell Harriman and Lord Beaverbrook proceeded to meet and confer with Generalissimo Stalin. Again Stalin was demanding tremendous amounts of war supplies from America. Most of his demands were granted and it was announced on September 24, 1941, that Russia, too, adhered to the basic principles of the Atlantic Charter, but, so far as we know, nothing was said about some day freeing these once independent little Baltic states, including Lithuania.

From that time on, supplies began to flow in ever-increasing amounts to aid giant Russia.

In June 1942 Russia was pleading for a second front and more and more supplies. Mr. Molotov, the people's Commissar of Foreign Affairs of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, came to Washington to confer with the President, and became the President's guest and conferred with him. On the 11th of June the White House released the following statement:

In the course of the conversations full understanding was reached with regard to the urgent task of creating a second front in Europe in 1942. In addition, the measures for increasing and speeding up the supplies of planes, tanks, and other kinds of war materials from the United States to the Soviet Union were discussed. Also discussed were the fundamental problems of cooperation of the Soviet Union and the United States in safeguarding peace and security to the freedom-loving peoples after the war. Both sides stated with satisfaction the unity of their views on all these questions.

At the conclusion of the visit the President asked Mr. Molotov to inform Mr. Stalin on his behalf that he feels these conversations have been most useful in establishing a basis for fruitful and closer relations between the two Governments in pursuit of the coming objectives of the United Nations.

The next day the mutual-aid or lend-lease agreement with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics was announced and in the text of the agreement we find these words:

And whereas the Governments of the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as signatories of the declaration by United Nations of January 1, 1942, have subscribed to a common program of purposes and principles embodied in the joint declaration, known as the Atlantic Charter, made on August 14, 1941, by the President of the United States of America and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the basic principles of which were adhered to by the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on September 24, 1941.

But again, so far as anyone knows, nothing was said about the future liberation of the little Baltic states, including Lithuania.

In December 1943 President Roosevelt made a long trip to Tehran to meet Joe Stalin and continue to conduct our foreign policy personally. Again military plans were laid to relieve the heavy pressure from Russia. Again the continued announcement of agreements on the basis of high principles gave momentum to the growing impression that Stalin and Russia had reformed and that ultimate independence of Poland and the Baltic states was assured. There were many who felt that there were some secret agreements at the Tehran Conference. The President finally denied these rumors in his report to the Congress on March 5, 1945, following his trip to Yalta, and I quote him:

At Tehran a little over a year ago there were long-range military plans laid by the Chiefs of Staff of the three most powerful nations. Among the civilian leaders at Tehran, however, at that time, there were only exchanges of views and expressions of opinion. No political arrangements were made and none were attempted.

So we see, once more Stalin got what he wanted in the way of help, but nothing was said about the future freedom of Poland or the Baltic states.

Then came the Yalta Conference early in 1945, and this time Joe Stalin and Russia really cashed in. Under lend-lease alone, billions of dollars worth of supplies had already been furnished to Russia, the second front had been opened, and now more plans were made to give Russia more supplies. With our help, the Russian troops had crossed Poland and our air power was reaching out ahead of the American troops to bomb strategic points to aid Russian troops in their advance on Berlin. Once more the declaration of the Conference at Yalta included a solemn affirmation of "faith in the principles of the Atlantic Charter," but in the same document they carved up Poland, again to the direct benefit of Russia. In explaining this the President, in his speech to the Congress on March 1, 1945, said:

We met in the Crimea determined to settle this matter of liberated areas and I am happy to confirm to the Congress that we did arrive at a settlement—and incidentally, a unanimous settlement. The three most powerful nations have agreed that the political and economic problems of any area liberated from the Nazi conquest or of any former Nazi satellite are a joint responsibility of all three governments. They will join together during the temporary period of instability after hostilities, to help the people of any liberated area, or of any former satellite state, to solve their own problems through firmly established democratic processes. They will endeavor to see to it that interim governments—the people who carry on the interim governments between the occupation of Germany and the day of true independence—will be as representative as possible of all democratic elements in the population, and that free elections are held as soon as possible thereafter.

And later the President also said:

The new Polish Provisional Government of National Unity will be pledged to holding a free election as soon as possible on the basis of universal suffrage and a secret ballot.

Again, I say this was represented to be a unanimous agreement and a solemn pledge between Russia and our Government. Recently it was reported and outlined in detail to the Members of Congress that our Government has three times since then protested Russia's failure to cooperate in granting free elections in Poland and that they have flagrantly violated their agreement entered into at Yalta. However, again nothing was said at the Yalta Conference about the future freedom and independence of Lithuania and the other Baltic States.

In his report to Congress, however, the President did say:

> There were, of course, a number of smaller things I have not time to go into on which joint agreement was had. We hope things will straighten out.

Later we found that one of the smaller things upon which he had no time to report was the secret agreement entered into at Yalta whereby the President agreed that Russia should get the Kurile Islands from Japan. These islands are off northern Japan and were used by the Japanese as a spring board for their attacks on the Aleutian Islands in the recent war. The secret agreement also had reference to Soviet desires regarding Port Arthur and Dairen. More appeasement of Russia and no demonstration of a willingness to follow out the principles of the Atlantic Charter.

At Potsdam the agreements made at Yalta were continued. Again, more appeasement of Russia and no evidence of the slightest inclination to adhere to the principles of the Atlantic Charter. The friends of Lithuania and other little countries continue to ask about our foreign policy. They were informed that Russia had become a member of the United Nations. When these hundreds of thousands of American citizens of Lithuanian and other Baltic descendency ask where they can turn, they are told that they may properly turn to the United Nations Charter, article XIV, which sets forth a provision that might bring them hope:

> Subject to the provisions of article XII the General Assembly may recommend measures for the peaceful adjustment of any situation, regardless of origin, which it deems likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations, including situations resulting from the violations of provisions of the present Charter, setting forth the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

It will be noted that this states that the General Assembly may recommend these measures, and so some of the members of the Friends of Lithuania addressed an inquiry to Mrs. Franklin Delano Roosevelt, a member of the United States delegation to the General Assembly of the United Nations. Her reply follows:

> UNITED STATES DELEGATION > TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY > OF THE UNITED NATIONS,
> December 16, 1946.
>
> Mr. P. J. ZURIS,
> American Friends of Lithuania,
> Lakewood, Ohio.
> DEAR MR. ZURIS: Thank you for your generous words on behalf of the American Friends of Lithuania regarding my position on the question of refugees and displaced persons.
>
> In answer to your request for my comments on the situation in the Baltic states, I am quite willing to express my personal views. It is my opinion that the Soviet Union's primary purpose in maintaining control of these countries is to provide an arsenal for the protection of her own boundaries. As the people in these Baltic countries win Soviet confidence, as the Soviet Union is convinced that they or their allies represent no threat to Soviet security, she will adopt a more friendly attitude toward them. This is a natural reaction among the people of all European nations who live in constant terror of invasion by their neighbors. One possible solution to this problem is to create a fringe of internationalized districts to divide these countries.
> I reiterate that the foregoing represents my own thoughts on the subject.
>
> Sincerely yours,
> ELEANOR ROOSEVELT.
> (Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt.)

Mr. President, this would clearly indicate that if the American representative to the General Assembly of the United Nations feels that the people of these Baltic countries must win Soviet confidence before the Giant Bear will adopt a more friendly attitude toward them, this is indeed a sad day for Lithuania and all small countries behind Russia's iron curtain.

There was a time when we had much greater influence with a nation like Russia, who understands only brute force and power. That was when the Germans were deep into the lands of Russia. It was when our air power was greater than the combined air power of all the rest of the world. It was when our naval strength was greater than the combined naval strength of all the other countries of the earth. It was when we were geared to the production and prosecution of war. During that time we won our wars throughout the entire earth against the most vicious and highly trained enemies of history. We were successful because all of America was participating. The youth of America, the blood, the flesh, the brain, the brawn, of America, the inventive genius, and the creative productive power, all combined for victory under the high ideals of the Atlantic Charter, but the ideals expressed in the Atlantic Charter made little or no advance in the world because the foreign policy of our country was kept within the control of one man, who felt that he alone knew how to bring the arrogant leader of Russia to collaborate honestly. It was written of him at the time:

> Mr. Roosevelt, gambling for stakes as enormous as any statesman ever played for, has been betting that the Soviet Union needs peace and is willing to pay for it by collaborating with the west.

He gambled, and from all the evidence apparent now he lost, and humanity lost, and civilization will pay dearly for years to come. The people of Poland, of Lithuania, and the other Baltic states, and millions more behind the iron curtain will pay dearly. The American people realize now that we sent 350,000 boys to their graves, a million men will live on carrying the effects of their wounds and generations to come will carry the burden of a financial debt because of the help we sent to Russia and other countries who claimed that they would adhere to the principles of the Atlantic Charter. The last lend-lease report shows that more than $11,000,000,000 of supplies were sent to Russia alone. The American people will pay the interest on that $11,000,000,000 this year, while Russia, up until a few days ago, had refused or declined to discuss any settlement of that obligation.

As we wrestle with such purely domestic problems as balancing our budget, reducing the cost of Government, reducing taxes, paying something on our national debt, we find that $5,000,000,000 each year must be paid in interest on our national debt and fifty billions of that debt was incurred by sending supplies to these nations who professed to believe in the Atlantic Charter. As we struggle through countless years to come we will pay the obligations incurred in the expenses, past, present, and future, resulting from this war. The tragedy is that representative government and freedom of the people have not been advanced.

This presents a tremendous challenge to our new Secretary of State, Gen. George Marshall, and to his associate, the Ambassador to the Soviet Union.

Our Ambassador to the Soviet Union, Mr. Bedell Smith, was Chief of Staff to General Eisenhower. He knows the supplies we sent, the aid we gave, the losses we suffered, to aid Russia, as our forces advanced across France and Germany.

General Marshall knows how many times we sent supplies that were needed by our own men to help the Russians defend their own country. These men, Marshall and Smith, played magnificent roles in the development of military strategy and tactical force that won the war.

Now they have the responsibility of picking up the broken threads of diplomatic failures, to win for people everywhere who love freedom of worship, freedom of speech and press, freedom of choice and action, the real advancement of the principles of the Atlantic Charter for which so many died, so many suffered, so many worked and prayed.

These men must now have the support of the American people and they must stand steadfast for the American ideals and stop the eternal appeasement of the enemies of the liberties we hold so dear.

CONTINUATION OF WAR EXCISE TAX RATES

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of House bill 1030, an act to continue in effect certain war excise tax rates, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1030) to continue in effect certain war excise tax rates, and for other purposes.

Mr. MILLIKIN obtained the floor.

MAINTENANCE OF THE ARMED FORCES

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. MILLIKIN. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in common with every Member of the Senate, I am constantly concerned with the problem of maintaining our armed forces.

The common defense is one of the prime responsibilities placed upon us by the Constitution; and it is utterly vital, not only for American security, but for the peace of the rest of the world, that we maintain armed forces at a sufficient strength effectively to support our foreign policy.

From the standpoint of Congress, the maintenance of armed forces requires that money and manpower be made available. While appropriating money is a serious matter, it is not as difficult as appropriating manpower. The supply of available manpower is strictly limited, and there is only a definite amount to go around for all purposes, civilian and military.

We shall soon confront the problem of making manpower available for our armed forces, and we shall have to decide between a voluntary and a compulsory system. In order to clarify this proposition and to bring some of its salient features into the open, I recently addressed a series of questions to Dr. Karl T. Compton, Chairman of the President's Advisory Committee on Universal Training. That committee, as I think the Senate knows, is sitting now, and will report within a few months. I should like to read the text of my letter, because it states in concise form some of the points which I think are crucial in this discussion:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
January 23, 1947.

Dr. KARL T. COMPTON,
Chairman of the President's Advisory Committee on Universal Training,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR DR. COMPTON: It is well recognized that the maintenance of peace and security and the successful development of the United Nations depend to a large degree on the United States being strong in its armed forces.

The American people are asked to—and must somehow—provide the manpower to set up armed forces to provide national security. From what I read, your Commission is concerning itself primarily with the question of whether a military training system can be set up which will provide effective national security and will also be beneficial to the individual.

The purpose of this letter is to suggest that the Commission primarily investigate the question of whether compulsory military training is necessary at all.

This is the question which is in the minds of American families having sons of military age. Unless it is answered with a conclusive affirmative, no plan for compulsory training or compulsory service can receive their enthusiastic support.

Personal observation leads me to believe that people want to know the answers to the following questions:

1. Is the Government of the United States, acting through its legislative and executive branches, organizing the total human and material resources of the Nation to provide national security against total war?

2. Does the Government of the United States possess conclusions which are at one and the same time authoritative, impartial, comprehensive and up to date regarding the effect of modern science on national security in the light of the facts of the world situation and of the capacity of our economy?

3. Are these conclusions sufficiently firm to enable the American people to tell what are the just demands to be made on their money and their manpower?

4. Do these conclusions include definite information on the following points:

(a) The effect of recent scientific developments and future scientific probabilities on the nature of air, ground, and sea warfare.

(b) The most effective method for allocating manpower as between industry, labor, agriculture, essential scientific research, and other civilian occupations on the one hand, and the armed services on the other.

(c) The method for allocating manpower between air, ground, and sea forces.

(d) The length of service for air, ground, and sea forces.

(e) The most effective way to procure needed manpower.

(f) The probable importance of fifth-column activity and biological warfare in any future war.

(g) The need for underground installations.

5. What is the present ability of the United States?

(a) To hold strategic air, ground, and sea bases.

(b) To provide immediate defense against air and surface attacks.

(c) To undertake counteroffensive action of all types.

(d) To discharge our immediate responsibilities, viz, the occupation of Germany and Japan, the provision of military forces for the United Nations, the support of American foreign policy in north China and Trieste, and the maintenance of communication to overseas bases.

(e) To mobilize rapidly.

(f) To eliminate efficiently the deadwood in the personnel of the regular air, ground, and sea services.

(g) To get quick decisions on matters affecting the air, ground, and sea services.

6. What is the present degree of American supremacy in scientific research and development?

Mr. President, I concluded the letter to Dr. Compton with these words:

I believe that these questions are uppermost in the people's minds when they ask themselves the question: "Is military training necessary?"

I trust that the powers of your Commission are broad enough to embrace all these questions. If not, I am sure a broadening of your directive would receive widespread support both in and out of Congress.

As one whose interest in national security is lifelong, I express the hope that your Commission will try to furnish the answers to these questions. On these answers will largely rest the decision of the American people and their representatives in Congress.

If you have no objection I would like to release this letter and your reply for publication because I believe there is value in having these questions, which are in so many minds, brought out into the open.

Very sincerely yours,

H. C. LODGE, Jr.

I received a reply from Dr. Compton which I should like to read. He said:

THE PRESIDENT'S ADVISORY COMMISSION ON UNIVERSAL TRAINING,
Washington, D. C., January 27, 1947.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, Jr.,
Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR LODGE: I am bringing your exceedingly interesting and stimulating letter of January 23 before our Commission on Universal Training, and take this opportunity to thank you for the constructive thought expressed in that letter. There is, of course, no objection to your release of your letter and of this reply, if you wish to make such a release.

It is, of course, impossible for our Commission at this stage to answer the specific questions which you have raised, because we are still in the process of securing information, evidence, and opinion on the various aspects of the problem. Perhaps I can best answer your questions by describing our Commission's operations and plans.

For some weeks to come we shall still be in the stage of seekng information, suggestions, and advice. We have reviewed the testimony at the previous congressional hearings and have invited individuals and representatives of groups who are informed and seriously concerned about these problems to discuss their views with us. Of course, we have had a large amount of correspondence, most of which expresses an opinion one way or another, but some of which contains really constructive suggestions. Among these witnesses are individuals within or without the Government who are in informed positions in respect to international affairs and in respect to the needs or deficiencies of our own armed services.

Thus far we have carefully refrained from coming to any final conclusions, either individually or as a group. I think this is very important because, whatever may have been the opinions and the degrees of information possessed by any of us at the beginning, we have been learning a great deal in the course of these studies.

More specifically in reply to your questions, I may say that it was immediately evident to us that our directive from the President must be considered on a sufficiently broad basis to cover not only the universal training program per se, but to consider this in relation to all the important related activities and agencies concerned with national security, character development, physical fitness, etc. Unless considered in relation to this environment, the recommendations would, of course, have little weight or value.

Because of this fact we have actually already been considering and attempting to secure authoritative information on most of the specific subjects about which questions are raised in your letter. I think a few of these points probably go somewhat beyond our particular directive, at least insofar as any extensive study is concerned. Most of them, however, are certainly an inherent part of our problem. You have raised so many interesting points that I am bringing your letter up for special consideration by our Commission as it lays its plans for future hearings and study.

To illustrate my own personal approach to the problem when it was first presented to me by the President's invitation to serve on this Commission, I enclose a copy of my letter of November 26 to him. I take it that his request for my service in the light of this letter indicates that he also intended the study to be made on a broad basis. Then when he gave us our directive at the time of our first meeting, which was fully reported in the papers, it was evident that he had in mind an even broader problem than just the military aspect of it.

I am sure you are right in emphasizing the fact that the American people must be convinced of a number of things of the type which you suggest in your letter if they will be willing through Congress to support any type of universal-training program. For this reason it is clear that whatever recommendations we make to the President must be backed up with adequate information and an adequate analysis of the factors involved. This is a really very great undertaking which we have accepted, I assure you, with very great humility. The only thing which I am sure of at the present moment is that we shall try to do our best on this assignment.

With sincere regards,

Very cordially yours,

KARL T. COMPTON,
Chairman.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of Dr. Compton's letter to the President be printed at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOVEMBER 26, 1946.

President HARRY S. TRUMAN,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In reference to your request that I serve as a member of the Advisory Committee on Universal Military Training, I feel that I should outline for you my present reaction to this problem in order that you may reconsider my appointment if you so desire. If, in the light of this explanation, you still wish me to serve I shall be glad to do so and will try to be as helpful as possible.

I believe fundamentally in the principle of universal military training to whatever extent this may be necessary for our national security. When the program was first put forward, while we were still at war, I endorsed it wholeheartedly. One reason for this was my belief that the enactment of such legislation at that time would have the wholesome effect of giving notice to the world that our country "meant business" so far as our future national security was concerned, and that we did not intend to fall into the state of unpreparedness which, before World War II, gave encouragement and confidence to the Nazi, Fascist, and Japanese ambitions for world domination.

I regret that we did not promptly enact the universal military training bill because part of the psychological value of such action has been lost. Nevertheless I still feel that it is of utmost importance for our country to take a strong stand in military preparedness and to relax and reduce our armed forces only in a proper relationship to general international disarmament supported by an effective international plan under the United Nations to enforce peace by combined military measures if necessary.

However, I believe that there are other very important aspects of national security in addition to a reservoir of citizens with military training. These include, of course, our Regular Army, Navy, and Air Force, together with the National Guard. I think it is especially important that we establish a highly mobile striking force equipped with the most powerful weapons which can be devised and highly trained on the technical side to use these weapons and prepared on minimum notice to strike any place in the world where aggression against us breaks out.

I also am convinced that our security demands an exceedingly active, forward-looking, and continuing program of research and development on new weapons. If the past war taught us anything about military tactics, it was to the effect that no new war will be fought by the old weapons and devices. Our security demands that we be in the forefront of new-weapon development.

It seems to me that the most important problem of national security is to determine as best we can the relative emphasis which should be devoted to the factors mentioned above in order that our country may have the maximum military strength in return for the amount of money from our national budget which Congress and the country will make available for military security purposes. Therefore, before advocating an all-out program for universal-military training, I think we should have some sound basis on which to judge whether the proposed military training program fits in proper proportion into the larger program. For example, if the money necessary to operate universal military training were so great as to prevent proper strength of our permanent armed forces or prevent the establishment of a mobile striking force, or curtail the program of research and development on new weapons, then I would feel that the universal military training program is an unwise investment of public funds and effort.

If I were to serve on the advisory committee on universal military training, I would have to raise these questions, and my support of any universal military-training program would depend on the place of this program in the larger problem of security subject to the over-all restrictions imposed by the amount of public funds which can and should be devoted to military preparedness.

It may be that this over-all problem has already received adequate consideration and if so I should be much interested to learn the conclusions, but I would not want to back and urge this one aspect of national preparedness without consideration of its effect on the military program as a whole.

If, knowing my feelings and reservations in the matter, you still wish me to serve on this advisory committee I shall accept and do my best to be helpful. If, however, you feel that someone else would serve the purposes of this advisory committee better than I, please have no hesitation in making a substitution.

Very sincerely yours,

KARL T. COMPTON.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to say, in conclusion, that the statement I am now making is an interim one on my part, because I think that the issue is a far-reaching one; it goes to the heart of family life; it touches a great many things we hold dear, and we cannot start too early in our deliberations and in our thinking on it.

I believe that the justification for the step that is contemplated must be on military grounds. If it is argued as a matter of education, or if it is argued as a matter of health, or as a cultural proposition, then I think the argument falls to the ground. It can only be justified on the grounds of stark military necessity, after assurance has been given that the lessons of modern science in the determination of military necessity have been intelligently and thoroughly and conclusively taken to heart.

I now yield the floor.

NOMINATION OF DAVID E. LILIENTHAL

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. MILLIKIN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. First I wish to have printed in the RECORD 10 articles by Frank C. Waldrop having to do with the Lilienthal case. I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STRANGE TVA DOINGS

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

Something very strange about the administration of the Tennessee Valley Authority is beginning to disclose itself out of the hearings before the Senate Public Works Committee on whether to confirm Gordon R. Clapp as a member of the TVA Board of Directors.

It has to do with communism and the degree of influence Communists have had in TVA matters.

To begin with, please bear in mind that communism is officially defined by our Department of Justice as having as its aim, purpose, and ambition the bloody overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence.

That definition was laid down by even so passionate a New Dealer as Attorney General Francis Biddle.

The aim of communism being to overthrow the Government of the United States by force and violence, it is plainly the duty and responsibility of every public official to be more than just passingly vigilant about keeping Communists, communism, and its influence out of Government offices under his jurisdiction.

Especially is it obviously the duty of a responsible official of TVA to show extraordinary vigilance, for not only is the Tennessee Valley today the home of the principal American atom-bomb works but also the TVA has been definitely shown to be a major experiment in American social planning.

TVA was supposed at its outset to be a flood-control and hydroelectric power project. It has grown actually to be a complete and haughtily independent project in remaking the economy of a section of our country.

And as such, financed by the taxpayers of the whole United States, its policy officers have an unmistakable, clear, and inescapable duty to keep TVA more than ordinarily "sanitary," you might say, with respect to communism.

They have had a duty not only to be innocent of fostering people who advocate the bloody overthrow of our Government, but more than that, to show themselves innocent in all possible ways.

The hearings on Mr. Clapp to date, therefore, are going to make some very disappointing reading to friends of TVA who realize how important it is for TVA to keep clear of Communist dirty business.

Mr. Clapp denies that he is a Communist or believes in communism, or is friendly to it. O. K. But he was a responsible officer of TVA, first personnel chief, and then general manager, when communism set up housekeeping in and on the edges of TVA.

What did he do about it? The record make him no hero, citizens.

Let's go back to the early part of 1940. During that time investigators for the House Committee on Un-American Activities discovered what they considered important evidence that communism had got a foothold within the offices of TVA.

They reported their preliminary findings to Representative Martin Dies, Democrat, of Texas, and then chairman of the committee. Dies was greatly excited and told them to go ahead with their investigation and make a fuller report.

That report was made and subpenas requested for witnesses to appear before a public, full-scale hearing of the Dies committee. Many of the witnesses were to be employees of TVA, and among them Gordon R. Clapp, general manager

The list of subpenaed witnesses and the fact that hearings were to be public got around Washington. The year 1940, remember, was kick-off time for F. D. R.'s term III, and the Dies hearings were set to be heard just about the exact moment Roosevelt was directing a stooge Democratic national convention at Chicago to "force" him to run again.

And so, all of a sudden, the list of witnesses was slashed, and the public hearings of the Dies committee abandoned. Instead, an executive session was held in the offices of House Speaker Bankhead—of all places—in greatest secrecy. Other sessions were held out of Washington. The evidence was completely suppressed, and no sign of its full significance revealed.

Russia at that time was tied up with Germany in joint plundering of Poland and other countries, so communism in TVA would have been a major vote loser for F. D., who was scared of trouble from Willkie on that matter anyhow.

This writer has just finished reading three volumes of those executive hearings at last available. They are an amazing story of Communist impudence and ridicule of a committee of Congress. For instance, on Friday, July 26, 1940, a subcommittee of the Dies committee consisting of then Representative Joe Starnes, Democrat, of Alabama, convened in executive session in Speaker Bankhead's back office.

Mrs. Muriel S. Williams, at that very time employed by TVA as an obscure clerk and typist—though she was a graduate of Mount Holyoke College, and obviously a woman of far better than average education and training—was put under oath to testify.

She admitted that she had been a member of the Communist Party, but claimed she had since resigned from the party—an unheard of procedure. Communists just do not join and quit at will.

After being asked about her own Communist activities and having given the committee plainly a very handsome run-around, she was asked:

"* * * the Chair instructs you, Mrs. Williams, to name the party members who were present (at Communist meetings) if you know who they were.

"Mrs. WILLIAMS. I just can't answer that question.

"Mr. STARNES. When you say you can't answer that question do you mean to say that you refuse to answer the question?

"Mrs. WILLIAMS. I mean to say that I refuse to answer the question."

There was a flat out, unqualified declaration by a known and admitted Communist employee of TVA who refused to give information to a committee of Congress concerning people who, according to Attorney General Francis Biddle, were aiming at and advocating the bloody overthrow of the Government of the United States.

For your information, though Mrs. Williams was in plain and open contempt of the Dies committee for that action, the committee did not cite her for contempt. Remember 1940 was an election year. Maybe that's why TVA also kept her on the pay roll until after the election. She was not fired until November 13, 10 days after F. D. R. won term III.

MORE ON TVA

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

Gordon R. Clapp is scheduled to go on the witness stand again today before the Senate Public Works Committee which is trying to determine whether he is fit to be promoted from general manager to a directorship of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

He should be asked specifically what he has done to stop communism around his jurisdiction.

This is a very important question, for billions of the American people's dollars are tied up in TVA and more than that a tremendous social experiment affecting the lives and property of millions of Americans directly, and all the rest of us indirectly.

TVA was designed in origin as a flood-control and hydroelectric-power project. It has grown, instead, into a many-sided operation by no means clearly understood by all paying for it.

More than that it has grown, in recent years, very upstage and independent toward people who ask questions about it.

There is plenty of evidence to show that TVA's managerial officials have been less than 100 percent vigilant to keep Communists out of their way and that the same Gordon R. Clapp above-mentioned is one of the officials involved.

Mr. Clapp knows the mechanics of TVA operation thoroughly. He has shown that.

But what has he to show in his record about fighting communism?

The Department of Justice has defined the Communists as advocating, teaching, and preparing for the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence.

That definition was handed down by none other than Francis Biddle, one of TVA's hottest defenders and as Attorney General of the United States, a most whole-hog New Dealer.

If Biddle says the Communists are advocating the overthrow of the Government of our country by force and violence, surely nobody in his right mind would say less.

It must have taken a mountainous weight of evidence to force that admission from Biddle, considering the fellow travelers in his own circle of friends, admirers, and political coattail riders.

And so, therefore, it has obviously been the plain duty of Mr. Gordon R. Clapp to be vigilantly anti-Communist in his various TVA executive jobs, which range from personnel manager to general manager and now, perhaps, director.

How, then, can Mr. Clapp show that he has done his fullest duty about communism when all the records are laid bare?

Consider, for instance, the case of John Marshall Frantz, a junior administrative assistant of the TVA who was secretly questioned by a one-man subcommittee of the House Committee on Un-American Activities in Chattanooga, Tenn., on July 17, 1940.

That secret testimony is now available in volume III of the executive hearings of the committee, pages 991 to 1012 inclusive. Surely nobody can read it and be satisfied with the way TVA has handled communism.

Frantz was shown to be a boon companion and close associate of Communists both in and hanging around TVA.

His brother, Laurent Brown Frantz, had been arrested in the Communist Party offices in Birmingham, Ala., where he had gone to do some legal research as he defined it, for one Robert Hall, secretary of the Communist Party for Alabama. Laurent Brown Frantz, incidentally, had been a WPA official before doing this work for the Communists that he himself admitted.

Well, both Frantzes denied Communist Party membership. But by any definition they would be classed as intimate fellow travelers.

How did Frantz and his Communist associates get into and around the TVA headquarters? Why were they allowed to stay until the Dies committee found them? Why didn't TVA managers chase these people and all their kind off the place without waiting for somebody else to point out their plain duty? What happened to them thereafter?

These are questions that cannot be laughed off, in view of the Communist spy activity that has been exposed lately in Canada and elsewhere in areas far less important to the United States than the Tennessee Valley, where our main atom bomb works and the Government's biggest hydroelectric power system are spread out.

Mr. Gordon R. Clapp was personnel manager and then general manager of TVA while that Communist cell was operating around TVA.

What did he do about it? The public is entitled to hear from him on that in fullest detail from the witness stand, today.

WHAT'S THE RUSH?

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

B. M. Baruch made a bad mistake in his appearance, Monday, before the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, if he meant his public testimony to be a weight against hasty decision on the vital issue of the atom bomb.

Mr. Baruch's mistake lay in his failure to say in public what he had been saying in private about the President's choice for head of the United States Atomic Energy Commission, David E. Lilienthal.

And worse, his failure to say in public what he had been saying in private about Lilienthal's choice for general counsel to the Commission, Herbert Marks.

Mr. Baruch's failure to speak out undoubtedly came about not for his lack of courage, since he has shown he has plenty of that time and again, but because of his anxiety not to hurt anybody's feelings or to seem personal in his judgments.

The fact is that Mr. Baruch told a number of friends before he went on the witness stand that he would positively testify against Marks for general counsel.

He also indicated that he did not care for Lilienthal as Chairman of the Commission but would not publicly say so.

His reason for not coming out against Lilienthal, he explained, was that none of the men he had recommended to the President for the Atomic Commission had been willing to serve or was acceptable to the President.

Among these were included Dr. Karl T. Compton, president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Dr. James B. Conant, president of Harvard University; and Mr. Chester Barnard, president of the Bell Telephone Co. of New Jersey.

"I can't very well object to Lilienthal," Baruch told his friends, "and then have to say that I haven't a better man to offer myself, when they ask me for suggestions. Nobody on my list was accepted at the White House. I can't be a dog in the manger about it."

Hence, when his public appearance was made, Monday, Mr. Baruch's testimony was grabbed up by the propagandists for Lilienthal and spread over the Nation as a whole-souled endorsement. And Marks is riding right along on Lilienthal's coattails.

Baruch did go so far as to indicate how he felt about the three key jobs of the atomic commission, chairman, general counsel, and general manager.

They control the show, he said. And he did say that he would have liked to see Maj. Gen. T. F. Farrell as general manager, thus putting the slug on the present nominee, C. E. Wilson.

The main importance of Baruch's failure to speak out frankly in public is that his words of commendation for Lilienthal as a citizen and public official are now being quoted as reasons for rushing the congressional hearings to a close.

The One Worlders and the Give the Bomb Away boys are saying that Baruch, as elder statesman and just-finished chairman of the United States policy-making committee to the United Nations on atomic energy, is the last word on the whole question.

If he signals O. K. on Lilienthal, the thing ends there. Shoot the works and fear nothing.

These are the same people and this is the same spirit that was chattering a year ago to also shoot the works and fear nothing in the matter of giving away our atomic know-how to Russia and the world.

When that nutty notion was sweeping the country nobody outside a very few knew what the Government of Canada had just discovered.

And that turned out to be a Russian spy ring, operated within the Russian Embassy to Canada, which had stolen not only atomic but other vital military secrets all through the war.

One of the confessed members of that spy ring was Dr. Alan May, a professor of Cambridge University, an independently wealthy and important native-born British scientist in the joint United States-British atomic project.

Dr. May was a trusted and high-placed public official. Maj. Gen. Leslie R. Groves, the wartime producer of the atom bomb, said that when Dr. May's acts of betrayal were disclosed to him he was "astounded."

For Dr. May's loyalty and integrity had never been challenged up to that moment. To this day there are people who would like to deny that May was a willing tool and spy for Russia—but they can't because he has confessed his acts in fullest detail and is serving a 10-year term in a British prison. He got off too easy. He should have been shot as the traitor that he is.

Therein lies a lesson and a warning to us all, and it is "Go slow." What we do about atomic power will affect the security of this Nation forever more. Whatever steps we take can never be taken back.

We can't guess. We have to be right the first time. Haste and then regret will be no help after the next Pearl Harbor.

The organization of the United States Atomic Commission as now proposed may be the right thing for the United States of America. Yet there is absolutely no use trying to deny that there is plenty of uneasiness around the country concerning this organization as presently constituted.

That uneasiness is important. For the reputation of Caesar's wife was nothing beside the reputation this Commission must have.

It is no good to say the Commission can be trusted to earn the fullest confidence of the people, in time. It must have that confidence before it starts.

Specifically, with respect to Lilienthal, the Communists definitely and unquestionably formed a cell within the Tennessee Valley Authority while he was in charge there. He can't deny the facts of that. He can only claim he didn't know about it.

Well, they fooled him once. How do we know they won't fool him again?

A rush act for his confirmation as master of the Atomic Commission and for his chosen managerial force is no way to inspire confidence. It is the exact opposite.

The rush act of last year to give away the bomb secrets almost ruined us. Let's not be suckers in the second round, for this game is for keeps.

Why not put the whole Atomic Commission matter aside for 6 months or a year and look it over again in a cooler moment? The Army has been running the atom-bomb works very successfully up to now. Let's not be in such a rush to take it away from them until we know more about what happens next.

BARUCH OFF THE RECORD

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

J. Edgar Hoover and the files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation may next appear in the joint congressional committee hearings on whether to confirm David E. Lilienthal's appointment as head of the United States Atomic Energy Commission.

They certainly will if the committee follows the off-the-record recommendations of B. M. Baruch, given in executive session with the committee a few days ago.

In his public appearance on the Lilienthal case, Baruch was extremely careful not to express any specific criticisms because, as he told friends, he did not want to embarrass the President or be a dog in the manger.

That was because none of his own recommendations for Chairman of the Commission had been accepted.

But when the doors were closed and the chips were down, Baruch's remarks to the committee took a very different tone. First, he said that it was not his place to be the committee's investigating agent.

According to one who was there present, Baruch told the committee:

"You gentlemen have no right to ask me to be your investigating agent. I can give you my opinion, and I think you understand me as to that. But when it comes to supplying you with the evidence on the basis of which to form your own judgments, that is what you're here for.

"Instead of asking me for supporting evidence, why don't you get it your own way?"

Specifically, he suggested that Hoover and the FBI files be summoned for full disclosure concerning communism in and around the Tennessee Valley Authority headquarters at Knoxville.

He also called attention to the War Department's Intelligence (G–2) files, and the files of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. All these, he pointed out, can give concrete information on matters about which committee members up to now have been simply asking private witnesses to give opinions.

Some of these sources of information are secret. Others are not. Among the public sources of fact about communism in the Tennessee Valley and in and around TVA itself are the hearings of the House Committee on Un-American Activities in the Presidential campaign year of 1940.

Anybody who wants to take the trouble to go up to the Library of Congress and ask can find out just what the committee developed on the subject. For instance, in volume 13 of the first series of hearing records, covering the period April 11 to May 21, 1940, in Washington, D. C.

Or again, in the executive (secret) hearings, volumes 2 and 3, covering the dates March 9, 11, 21, June 3, July 8, 9, 10, 11, 16, 17, 18, 19, 22, 26, and August 5, 6, 16, 17, 19, and 20, 1940.

At the time they were held these inquiries were extremely confidential.

The whole committee never sat but instead an off-the-record meeting would be called in the back office of Speaker Bankhead of the House of Representatives, if it were a Washington session.

One or maybe two committee members, a witness, and a couple of committee investigators would be smuggled into the room for a hasty recording of testimony.

Or in various cities around the TVA region a single committee member would hold the same kind of smuggled session.

Plainly the committee was cooperating with the Roosevelt administration to keep the facts out of the newspapers for fear that the Republicans would make the most of the scandal bound to unfold.

But secret or no, the testimony was taken, and now is available for any person concerned to read. Take a look, for instance, at the testimony in volume 2, above mentioned, as given by—

John C. Borden, of Raleigh, N. C.; William B. Green, of Fountain City, Tenn.; W. E. Holbert, of Knoxville, Tenn.; Mrs. George H. Paris, Knoxville, Tenn.; Kenneth B. Talley, Norris, Tenn.; C. L. Wayman, Knoxville, Tenn.; F. C. White, formerly of the TVA.

Or, in volume 3, the testimony of Mabel Abercrombie, of Nashville, Tenn.; J. M. Frantz, Knoxville, Tenn.; Henry C. Hart, Knoxville, Tenn.; David Stone Martin, Knoxville, Tenn.; Hugh W. Urban, Knoxville, Tenn.; I. C. Wiggs, Knoxville, Tenn.; and Mrs. Muriel S. Williams, Knoxville, Tenn.

These give just the outlines, just show how a few simple-minded front men and women got caught with Communist Party cards right on them—employees of TVA who absolutely had no way of denying their communism any longer. Some even claimed to have been enrolled without realizing what they were signing up for, and they probably didn't at that.

But the people who swore them into communism knew, all right.

The hearings show some very nimble work by others who, so timid and scared was the committee at what it was finding out, were able to laugh right in the faces of the investigators and refuse to tell what they admitted they knew.

Their defiance was as flat and positive as that of the Comintern agent, Gerhard Eisler, in his brief show before the House Un-American Activities Committee 2 days ago.

And all this went on while Lilienthal headed TVA. What did he do about it? The record will show.

WHAT'S THE RUSH?

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

The same people who were all for giving the atom bomb to Russia this time a year ago are now in a flaming hurry to see David E. Lilienthal confirmed as Chairman of the United States Atomic Commission.

What's the big rush?

This game of the atom bomb is for keeps and will be the last big game of power ever played on this earth if all the scientists say about the bomb is true.

We're the only nation with the power to say what shall be done with the bomb. Other nations would certainly like to have that power, other nations some day may have it. But all that is speculation.

The fact is that we have the bomb and the fact is that atomic power so far is strictly military in its uses.

If there is any reasonable speculation to be made about the future, it surely must be that next time atomic power is used on earth it will be used in the same way it was used the first time—to kill people and destroy property—literally to make a hell of earth wherever it is exploded.

Therefore we people of this present generation in the United States have a terrible responsibility not to misplay this one.

Let's take a good, clear look at the case of Lilienthal as calmly as possible. The latest issue of Who's Who reports on him thus:

"Lilienthal, David Eli. Chairman, Tennessee Valley Authority, lawyer. Born in Morton, Ill., July 8, 1899; son of Leo and Minna (Rosenak) Lilienthal; A. B., DePauw University, 1920; LL. D., 1945; LL. B., Harvard, 1923; m. Helen Marian Lamb, September 4, 1923; children—Nancy Alice, David Eli. Admitted to Illinois bar, 1923; Tennessee bar, 1934; in practice of law, Chicago, 1923–31; member of Wisconsin Public Service Commission, 1931; Director, Tennessee Valley Authority, since 1933; appointed Chairman, 1941; member American Bar Association, Delta Upsilon, Delta Sigma Rho, Sigma Delta Chi, Phi Beta Kappa. Author, TVA, Democracy on the March. Home, 81 Pine Road, Norris, Tenn. Office, New Sprankle Building, Knoxville, Tenn."

This is by no means a complete picture of Lilienthal, though it does provide some very significant clues, the main one of which is that his adult career has been virtually all in the service of Government.

Lilienthal has shown in many ways that he is an extremely competent Government administrator. He knows how to use the power of Government with crushing force and has built within the TVA a machine of lawyers and subadministrators utterly loyal to him.

To give you a familiar parallel, Lilienthal is to the TVA managerial force what Mr. Justice Felix Frankfurter was and still is to the New Deal's sharpshooting gang of lawyers and administrators who pulled the power of America into Washington during the 1930's and came within an ace of fixing it here under their monopoly.

Even Lilienthal's worst enemy would have to admit he is far from stupid. He is exactly the contrary, an extremely shrewd, hard-driving, passionate, even fanatic, and opinionated type of human being, smart and able at whatever he undertakes.

In the TVA he roved the organization until he knew it inside out.

It so happened that the Communist Party of the United States formed a nasty and disruptive public cell within the TVA—what else it accomplished can only be imagined, for a full and fair investigation by competent authorities has never been made public if it was made at all.

But the House Committee on Un-American Activities in the first 6 months of 1940 stumbled awkwardly into enough hot stuff to make it plain and clear to anybody that the Reds had their hooks into TVA and had had them in for years.

How did Lilienthal overlook that development? How did his man, Gordon R. Clapp, then personnel manager and now up to succeed Lilienthal as Chairman of the TVA Board, overlook that development?

Lilienthal is being presented to the country as the man to be trusted with the most dangerous and potent force ever discovered on this planet, the atom bomb. Surely it is the will of America that he look after this force in the interest of America, first.

That he cannot do, if Communists get into his organization again as they did once.

Lilienthal's will and competency to keep the Communists out are the essential challenges before Congress.

Everybody knows that. And plenty of people are disturbed about it. Yet not enough people who could help determine the facts are speaking up and telling the world how they feel.

Even so distinguished an elder statesman as B. M. Baruch testified one way in public before the committee last Monday, and entirely another way in executive session.

That's not giving the people of the United States a fair deal in this vital matter. It's not fair to Lilienthal, either.

The Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy has an awful decision to make here and haste, hints, talking from two sides of the mouth and all such evasions of the hard proposition just won't do.

If there was ever a subject to be discussed on the record, it is the subject of communism and its background with respect to TVA and the atom.

Our national future depends on this. Every agency that can throw light on the truth should be called on to produce what it knows.

This includes the Army and Navy intelligence forces, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Civil Service and the citizens of the TVA region in general.

This game is for keeps. Haste is criminally dangerous. Let's take a year on the Lilienthal case, and find out all there is to know before going one step farther.

ASK THE FBI

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

A proposal to adjourn the Senate hearings on David Lilienthal as head of the United States Atomic Commission is scheduled for consideration today when Lilienthal's partner in the State Department report on the atom, Under Secretary of State Dean Acheson, comes on to testify for his friend.

The reason for the adjournment project is that the committee sitting on the Lilienthal case has not the power to subpena documents and testimony of great significance concerning communism in the Tennessee Valley Authority, of which Lilienthal has been head.

This lack of power is only recently discovered and comes about in the following way:

There is now a Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, made up of members of both the House and the Senate. This joint committee has full subpena and investigatory power.

But the hearings now being held are by the Senate members only, who are doing the Senate's preliminary work on whether Lilienthal's appointment to head the atomic commission shall be confirmed.

And as such a committee on confirmation, the Senators involved have no power of subpena or investigation. They can only take testimony of individuals.

Members of the committee have discovered that they can get at secret information in the files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Civil Service Commission, War and Navy Departments and other sources only through subpena.

Therefore the project to adjourn the Senate operation as such and reconvene as the joint committee in full with power to summon all the witnesses, hear all the testimony and examine all the secret reports they wish, with a view to making a report back to themselves later as a committee sitting on Lilienthal's case.

The burden of the testimony against Lilienthal is that while he was the mainspring of TVA the Communist Party organized right in TVA headquarters and he knew nothing about it until the House Committee on Un-American Activities flashed the facts before his eyes.

The Senators have been considerably more disturbed by the testimony they have heard than is indicated in the newspaper reports of the celebrated McKellar-Lilienthal feud, the campaign of Tennessee's K. D. MCKELLAR for revenge on Lilienthal for personal reasons.

But in order to be sure of their ground in any vote they make on the matter they are demanding better evidence—both ways—than has been shown them to date. The FBI has the answers they want and today starts the project to get these.

As for Acheson, there are a number of sharp questions several Senators want to ask him if they can get MCKELLAR to keep quiet for a while.

Last week while Lilienthal and MCKELLAR were rowing, several Senators sat quietly in their offices and read advance proofs of the latest issue of Plain Talk giving a survey of the Lilienthal-Acheson operations compiled by Isaac Don Levine and entitled "Our Atomic UNRRA—Conspiracy or Blunder?"

Levine charges that the true story of our atomic policy is "woven of the triple webs of atomic espionage, atomic propaganda, and atomic diplomacy."

He goes into a detailed tracing of the performances of Lilienthal, Acheson, their operating lawyer, Herbert Marks, who is scheduled as general counsel of the Atomic Commission if Lilienthal is confirmed, and the preelection buzzing of the CIO-PAC for Lilienthal to head the Commission.

Levine, who is one of the most widely known authorities on Communist organization, describes the Acheson-Lilienthal plan for handling the United States atomic power thus:

"If Moscow had secretly devised and prepared a plan for making the United States set up an atomic UNRRA with the idea of foisting it upon a gullible America through its innumerable 'fronts' it could hardly have differed in this respect from the Acheson-Lilienthal plan."

The committee is also expected to make a detailed investigation of the sworn testimony of Mrs. Muriel Williams, who stated under oath that while she was a Communist and employee of the TVA she attended meetings at which Herbert Marks was present.

Mrs. Williams' disclosures are contained in volume II of the executive hearings of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, pages 1265–1307, inclusive.

In the course of these she was questioned as to Communist and fellow-traveler associates with whom she went to meetings which she identified variously as straight Communist Party operations, union sessions, fund-raising affairs for various Spanish civil war relief projects on the pro-Communist side, etc.

Concerning one of these, the exact character not specified, she testified as follows:

"Question. And Herbert Marks, you know Herbert Marks?"

"Answer. Yes."

"Question. And you attended meetings with Herbert Marks?"

"Answer. Well, you see when you say this meeting business—yes."

The facts were never followed up as Mrs. Williams shortly thereafter refused to give any more information and though she was warned she was in contempt of the committee, the matter was dropped.

She remained on the TVA pay roll until immediately after the 1940 election.

Now the Senate is having to pick up the inquiry nearly 7 years late.

WHAT'S THE RUSH?

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

Now that it is becoming clear that others beside Senator K. D. MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, have a word to say about the fitness of David Lilienthal to command the United States atomic power, there is all the more reason for the Joint Atomic Committee of Congress to take more and more time before coming to a decision.

For if there ever was a matter before the United States Congress that calls for being right the first, last, and only time, this is it.

The atom power is declared by all competent authorities who have mentioned it to date to be the biggest fact of life on this planet today.

The United States owns and controls atomic power. What we do with it will decide the fate not just of a political party or a Presidential election, or of even a single nation.

It will decide the fate of the world.

David Lilienthal is asserting himself the man to be trusted with this power, and his friends—the same kind of people who were yelling a year ago for us to give the atomic power to Russia—are yelling today to rush his appointment through and let him loose at his master work.

Such a rush act would be foolhardy and it would be criminal recklessness with the fate of mankind, no less.

It is only common sense that the Senators who have to make the terrible decision on what to do about Lilienthal must have every possible fact before them when they vote.

There is only one sound way to judge what Lilienthal will do, and that is by examining what he has done. Judgment cannot be based on his conversation, or on his declamation, from the witness stand, as to what he believes about so all-embracing a word as "democracy."

Lilienthal made quite a speech the other day about what he believes. But what do the Senators know about what he has done?

For instance, do the Senators know his record with the Wisconsin Public Service Commission, with which he served before going to the Tennessee Valley Authority? Do the Senators really know anything about Lilienthal's performance with the TVA?

Do the Senators know how Lilienthal in his early days instituted and handled suits against the Illinois and Wisconsin telephone companies and what the courts said about the methods for which he bears the responsibility?

Have the Senators investigated Lilienthal's performance with TVA in wartime?

Just as a tip, why not summon J. G. Menut, who is now the War Department's electric power procurement officer, and ask him under oath about his experiences with Lilienthal and Lilienthal's assistants, Gordon R. Clapp and Herbert Marks?

Clapp is now nominated to succeed Lilienthal as head of the TVA and Marks is nominated to be general counsel of the Atomic Commission which Lilienthal would command.

What are all their records of performance?

Another who ought to be summoned for detailed questioning specifically with reference to Marks is Donald Nelson, former head of the War Production Board, to answer about letters Marks prepared for his signature, and what became of them when Nelson had a second look.

Still another to be questioned is Senator LISTER HILL, Democrat, of Alabama.

Mr. HILL, for instance, is one of the most vociferous champions of Lilienthal and Clapp. Behind that fact lie other facts, such as this:

For some years Lilienthal and Clapp have been trying to get authority to build a phosphate plant in Mobile, Ala., with the taxpayers' money as trusted with TVA. Among other things the plant was supposed to have war usefulness.

To achieve this plant in Mobile, the TVA would run a power line straight through the State of Alabama from the Tennessee line to the Gulf coast, an extremely expensive operation.

The Senators looking into Lilienthal's ability as manager of atomic power ought to call the War Department's Chemical Warfare Service to see what its files show on this subject.

For Army officials all through the war and right through the last session of Congress stood in opposition to Lilienthal on that, holding that Mobile was no place to locate the plant for Army purposes, as it was claimed.

Yet Lilienthal has tried every way he could to get it and Senator HILL, his great supporter for atomic power—how does he stand on the TVA proposal to run an expensive power line through Alabama to build a plant Army officials oppose, supposedly to help the Army?

These are just a few of the lesser reasons for delaying action on Lilienthal until all the facts are established about his ability and judgment. But the most important remains:

What did Lilienthal do about communism in the TVA?

Sworn officials show that the Communist Party organized in TVA headquarters right under Lilienthal's nose. He didn't know about it. What did he do when he did learn the facts? Only a full, fair, and public inquiry by committees with subpena power can find the answer.

LOOK AGAIN

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

Senators responsible for deciding whether to confirm David Lilienthal as master of the atom bomb and his man Gordon Clapp to run the Tennessee Valley Authority, could develop a very interesting background by investigating the facts of communism in the TVA.

These facts are not hard to find and they cannot be misunderstood, once examined. For example, on July 17, 1940, one Henry C. Hart, an employee of the TVA, was called by the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

He was asked whether he was a Communist and replied that he had been but had quit being one. He was then asked who had solicited his membership in the party, and Hart replied:

"Mr Wellman, as the representative of the Communist Party and a TVA employee named Katharine Buckles who was a personal friend of mine and introduced me to Wellman."

A little further on, Hart was asked to name other TVA Communists and he said he was the only member so far as he knew.

How to square that with his testimony above that he was solicited to join the Communist Party by TVA employee Katharine Buckles is a question the committee failed to pursue.

Had it done so, Hart would have had to do a considerable amount of explaining.

It would also be interesting to know what Lilienthal and Clapp did about Hart's testimony. As TVA board member and general manager, respectively, they were sworn to uphold the Constitution of the United States.

Part of that, obviously, means keeping Communists off the Government pay roll, for Communists are dedicated to the overthrow of our Government by force and violence.

That definition of communism in the United States of America was laid down by an Attorney General of the United States, Francis Biddle, in the course of a wartime proceeding that any Senator can study if he is interested. It was the case of United States v. Bridges, and the Department of Justice today will supply to anybody on demand the facts above stated.

Yet here we have Henry Hart, admitted a Communist, on the TVA pay roll, admitting he was solicited for Communist Party membership by another TVA employee—and what does the record show as to the activities of Lilienthal and Clapp against such matters?

So far, only that Clapp says Hart told him that he, Hart, had resigned the Communist Party and that Hart denied writing a letter to the Communist Party headquarters giving damaging insight into Communist work within the TVA.

Clapp admits that he never pursued the Hart matter beyond merely receiving Hart's general denials. Does anybody think that is a serious-minded and responsible method of protecting the United States Government's interests against communism?

Lilienthal was there all the time, too. What did he do about the leads and evidence developed by the questioning of Hart? Lilienthal says he is the man to be trusted with control of the United States atom power.

How he handled communism in the TVA is a crucial test of how he can be expected to handle the atom, which communism is trying to get at by every means of espionage, blackmail, fraud and misrepresentation at its command.

What Lilienthal did about communism once is a fair test of what he can be expected to do again. Let's see what his record shows.

Incidentally, there is a good deal more to be shown about the interests, associations, and records of other people who have nosed into this Lilienthal-Clapp affair.

On the floor of the House of Representatives day before yesterday, Representative EUGENE COX, Democrat, of Georgia, raised serious doubts about Lilienthal and Clapp. Representative ADOLPH SABATH, Democrat, of Illinois, came to their defense.

Mr. SABATH is a very elderly man. His secretary and thinking guide is one Harold Buckles. And who is he?

Why Harold Buckles happens by oddest chance to be the brother of Katharine Buckles (now Katharine Buckles Schryver), that very same one whom Henry Hart mentioned as shown above.

Katharine Buckles Schryver now is no longer with TVA. Instead she is executive secretary of an organization calling itself the National Committee To Abolish the Poll Tax—which has been subsidized by the Communist Party.

Harold Buckles, just in passing, may also be remembered as a faculty member of the National Citizens' Political Action Committee's School of Political Action Techniques, which had as its announced aim and object the prevention of this Republican Eightieth Congress' election.

Senators who have to bear the responsibility of voting Clapp into command of the TVA and Clapp's boss, Lilienthal, into control of the atom, can find plenty of factual data on the activity of communism in TVA by doing a very little investigation of the sworn and public record.

It is contained in volume 13 of the first series of hearings by the House Committee on Un-American Activities, April 11–May 21, 1940, and the executive hearings, volumes 2 and 3, covering the period, March 9–August 20, 1940, with special reference to the testimony of:

Robert B. Barker, Laurent Brown Frantz, John C. Borden, William B. Green, W. E. Holbert, Mrs. G. E. Paris, Kenneth B. Talley, C. L. Wayman, Frank C. White, Mabel Abercrombie, John M. Frantz, Henry C. Hart, David S. Martin, Hugh W. Urban, I. C. Wiggs, and Mrs. Muriel S. Williams.

If after that they conclude Lilienthal and Clapp were properly vigilant against communism in the TVA and were on their toes to protect the Constitution of the United States against Communist infiltration, then said Senators must be very new to the ways of the world.

EX-TVA CHAIRMAN HOGGED STEEL NEEDED FOR MUNITIONS

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

Evidence revealed to the Times-Herald yesterday disclosed a clear conflict between War Department records and the testimony of Secretary of War Patterson to the joint committee of Congress now conducting hearings on whether to confirm David E. Lilienthal as Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission.

One of the documents shown to the Times-Herald was even signed jointly by Patterson and James V. Forrestal at a time they were respectively Under Secretaries of War and Navy.

Patterson appeared before the confirmation committee on Tuesday to endorse Lilienthal, and in the course of his testimony was asked by Senator HICKENLOOPER (Republican), of Iowa, committee chairman, whether there had been any wartime trouble between the War Department and the Tennessee Valley Authority, of which Lilienthal has been Chairman.

Information available to the Times-Herald reflects that:

1. The TVA and Lilienthal directly were in open conflict with the Army Chemical Warfare Service about the building of a phosphate plant in Alabama to such extent that the CWS even changed its formula for camouflage smoke to escape Lilienthal's designs.

2. That Lilienthal forced the diversion to long-range TVA dam building and other projects of heavy steel and other equipment which responsible War Department officials sought for immediate fighting usage.

3. That Herbert Marks, prewar TVA general counsel, but after Pearl Harbor with the Power Division of the War Production Board, undertook a project to prevent the Army-Navy Munitions Board from having a voice in the control of wartime electric power projects.

(It was this undertaking of Marks that resulted in Patterson himself being involved—of which details hereinafter.)

4. That Marks was directly accused during the war of withholding the dispatch of WPB directives involving thousands of tons of steel, until the Bonneville public power project on the west coast had tied these up, though WPB had directed that Bonneville release the steel.

5. That Marks was accused of the same course of obstruction of the Army-Navy Munitions Board in other detailed instances.

Marks is now special assistant to Dean Acheson, Under Secretary of State, who was private counsel to Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter. Marks is also nominated by Lilienthal as general counsel to the Atomic Commission Lilienthal seeks to head. Acheson and Lilienthal are joint authors of the formula for international use of atomic power that Lilienthal seeks to undertake as soon as the Senate confirms him, if it does.

With respect to No. 3 episode (above), which involves Patterson himself, the background is as follows:

A. On February 16, 1942, Donald M. Nelson, then WPB Chairman, wrote Ferdinand Eberstadt, Chairman of the Army-Navy Munitions Board, requesting a change in operating procedure so that the Munitions Board and the WPB Power Branch could expedite their decisions.

These decisions were basic to the war effort as they not only involved the use of tremendous tonnages of critical war materials but also decided the placement and amounts of electric power necessary to drive essential war industrial plants.

B. On February 23, 1942, the Army-Navy Munitions Board designated two officers to accomplish the ends suggested by Nelson. These officers were Lt. Col. J. C. Damon and Lt. Comdr. F. P. Quigley.

C. On March 9, 1942, the WPB's director of industry operations, J. S. Knowlson, replied with a memorandum to Eberstadt setting forth details of how the Army-Navy Munitions Board's agents would be received by the WPB Power Branch. In effect, they were to be permitted to attend proceedings, say what they thought ought to be done, and would then receive in reply the verdicts of WPB. They would have access to no evidence except that offered them by WPB and would have no power in the deliberations on the verdicts.

File copies of this letter were examined and it was found that it was composed by Herbert S. Marks for Knowlson's signature and signed with Knowlson's name.

D. That in reaction to this WPB undertaking Eberstadt prepared a memorandum of advice to Under Secretaries Patterson and Forrestal. Here is the text:

MARCH 16, 1942.

Memorandum to the Under Secretaries of War and Navy.

Subject: Functions of Army and Navy Munitions Board representatives, War Production Board, Power Branch.

1. References made to the attached copy of Mr. Knowlson's letter, March 9, 1942, in which he takes exception to War Department's interpretation of the responsibilities and duties of Colonel Damon and Commander Quigley, the Army and Navy Munitions Board representatives in the War Production Board, Power Branch.

2. The directive of February 23, 1942, copy attached, to these officers specifically stated that they were "designated as the Army and Navy Munitions Board clearance officers to work in cooperation with the War Power Branch of the WPB with respect to projects coming before that Branch."

The directive went on to state that the "principal duty will be to review such projects from the standpoint of essentiality to war production" and that "when the project under consideration is needed to sustain and augment war production and merit the support of the ANMB you will recommend an appropriate rating to be assigned. Projects that are not considered essential will not be supported."

3. I do not believe that these officers have misinterpreted either the letter or the spirit of the directive which was issued to them, as it was clearly the intention of the War and Navy Departments that these officers were to judge projects in the light of each project's importance to the war effort.

4. In reading the four numbered paragraphs of Mr. Knowlson's letter outlining what he and Mr. Krug consider the definitions of responsibilities, it is apparent that he does not wish the War or Navy Department to have access to any information other than what Mr. Krug would make available.

Obviously if the War and Navy Departments are to be restricted as to information upon which to base recommendations concerning projects to only such information as is deemed appropriate by the WPB, the recommendations of the officers will in many cases at least be founded on only partial evidence.

An example of this is the matter of excess use of copper for transmission lines in Texas.

5. The War and Navy Departments have, through over a century, built up in the minds of the citizens of this country a certain feeling of confidence and of integrity in their actions because these Departments are not ordinarily influenced by motives other than those specifically directed toward success in battle.

It is unthinkable of either or both of the armed services to lend themselves to participation in decisions concerning the use of power or its transmission, or the use of materials therefor, for purposes not directly aimed toward winning of the war and therefore, in effect, resulting in a weakened war effort. Consequently, it is necessary in order to prevent this that the ANMB have the continued right of independent access to all available information.

6. The original purpose of having these officers participate in the deliberation of WPB's committee was to effect a saving in time. As was pointed out when this matter first came up, the greatest loss in time in consideration of project applications was in the WPB and not in the ANMB. Power section rating took more than a day or so in the consideration of debatable projects.

Whereas there were instances of projects having lain unacted upon in the War Production Board for many weeks.

I feel that it is possible by having these officers collaborate with the War Production Board to effect a saving in time and this should be done, but it should not result in the loss of independent judgment or the basis for such independent judgment of the War and Navy Departments.

7. In view of the fundamental principle involved in this matter, I suggest that a letter similar to the attached draft be sent to Mr. Knowlson and that such letter be signed by the Under Secretary of War and Navy Departments on the ANMB.

FERDINAND EBERSTADT,
Chairman, Army and Navy Munitions Board.

E. That Patterson and Forrestal on March 21, 1942, sent a letter to Knowlson carrying out the line of Eberstadt's memorandum to them in almost his exact words except to allow that while the War and Navy Departments do not "question the reliability of the information obtained by the power branch of the War Production Board," etc., they still "desire and intend" to be fully informed on all the evidence involved.

They added that the "winning of the war may be adversely affected" by the lack of Army-Navy information as above outlined.

Following the joint Forrestal-Patterson letter to Knowlson, the undertaking attributed to Mr. Marks was "dropped."

GET IT RIGHT

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

President Truman hotly declared yesterday that David E. Lilienthal is no Communist. That is very good news and timely, since Mr. Lilienthal is up before the Senate as Mr. Truman's proposed Chairman of the United States Atomic Commission.

But it is not very big news.

Considering that Mr. Truman nominated Mr. Lilienthal for the job, it is unlikely that he would say Lilienthal is a Communist, and for that matter it is more than unlikely that anybody with a responsible mind would say Lilienthal is a Communist, on the basis of any evidence even yet hinted.

The issue that has snarled up Senate proceedings as to Lilienthal is not really whether he is a Communist but whether under his administration of the Tennessee Valley Authority there were any Communists in the TVA, and if so what Lilienthal did about them.

What Lilienthal did to defend TVA against Communist infiltration is of vital concern to everybody, because everybody knows the Communists of the world are using every device in their formidable arsenal of theft, bribery, lying, fraud, and murder to get at the atom bomb.

Is Lilienthal smart and tough enough to stand them off? Has he the will to do it?

That is the real issue and the only intelligent way to make a common-sense guess about it is to examine what Lilienthal has done in the past about Communists and communism.

The best evidence in that field centers on the Tennessee Valley Authority, with which Lilienthal has been a high-placed, trusted, and responsible officer from its beginnings to date.

Conversation is not enough. What are the facts now of record and available?

Here is a sample in that direction from the sworn testimony of Mrs. George H. Paris, of Knoxville, Tenn., taken in 1940 by the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

Mrs. Paris stated that she was a member of the American Legion Auxiliary and that she joined the Communist Party in January of 1939 to see what it was doing in and around her community.

She said that she made notes after attending meeting and when she testified, read from the notes to refresh her memory. She specifically said that she attended meetings of a Communist unit at which were present TVA employees and that one of these TVA Communists said:

"With Joseph Swidler up there we can get any information we want and it will be legal and won't cost us anything, because he is so closely associated with us."

Joseph C. Swidler was then solicitor for the TVA, a highly responsible job, and is now general counsel and secretary to a TVA offshoot corporation.

Now surely it is fair to ask Mr. Lilienthal and his man, Swidler, what they did when they learned about such testimony as that above quoted. Not what they thought, but did.

It certainly would be reasonable to expect that they would blow the roof off and find out who had been passing out such allegations, and why.

Mrs. Paris further quoted from her notes: "Mr. Jandry has said we need not fear we will lose our jobs because we are Communists in the TVA."

She identified "Mr. Jandry" as Arthur C. Jandry, now assistant general manager of the TVA.

What did Lilienthal and Jandry do about that testimony? What does the record show?

Another witness before the same committee testified under oath that while sitting in the offices of the TVA personnel division waiting to apply for a job he was told that if he would join the Communist Party "everything would be taken care of."

What did Lilienthal do about that when he heard of it? What does the record show? The witness mentioned was William B. Green of Fountain City, Tenn.

William Edward Holbert of Knoxville, Tenn., also testified under oath in the same hearing that he obtained the Communist Party identification cards of seven TVA employees and turned them over to the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Knoxville where they were photostated. He said that when the originals were returned to him he burned them.

What do the records of the FBI show about that? What did Lilienthal do about that when he heard of Holbert's testimony?

Surely it is not unreasonable to say that what Lilienthal did about such evidence as above cited will be worth considering as a clue to what he will do the next time Communists cross his trail pursuing the atom bomb.

Anyhow enough people think so that the Senators hearing his case ought to show a little interest in finding out what he did, as compared with what he says.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, some of the newspapers supporting Mr. Lilienthal are claiming that I am smearing him; therefore I want to do something for him. I state to the Senate that I am informed Mr. Lilienthal now has on his side the Daily Worker, the largest Communist newspaper in the United States. I ask that there be printed in the RECORD at this point an article from the Daily Worker, as published in the Knoxville Journal yesterday.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Knoxville Journal of Feb. 16, 1947]

THE DAILY WORKER, COMMUNIST PUBLICATION, ENDORSES LILIENTHAL APPOINTMENT

Here is an editorial which appeared in The Daily Worker, a Communist paper in New York, February 12, 1947, under the heading "From Eisler to Lilienthal."

"With the ganging up on David Lilienthal, the country can see a little more clearly what is behind such hysteria-making devices as the 'Eisler case' and 'atom spy' scares.

"Lilienthal is a well-known Roosevelt New Dealer, sponsored for by multimillionaire Bernard Baruch, and even by the colleague of Martin Dies, Joe Starnes, of Alabama.

"But Mr. Lilienthal helped President Roosevelt in the TVA project.

"And for this crime, he will not so easily be forgiven by the rough-riding muscle-men of the GOP gang. They have hated such competition with the power trust.

"Could they slash Lilienthal's reputation to pieces before public opinion because of his TVA achievement? Not so easily. The patronage-greedy Senator MCKELLAR could not confess that his hatred of TVA and Lilienthal was based on lust for graft. The 'red menance' was handier.

"And if the GOP could first drench the Nation in a cloud of poison gas concerning 'Russian spies' and 'Soviet master minds' allegedly hanging around back alleys in New York's family neighborhoods, they then could 'get' Lilienthal easily.

"They only had to mention his name along with the 'spies' and 'Russian appeasers,' and his goose was well on the way to being cooked.

"The 'Lilienthal treatment' grows out of the 'Eisler treatment.'

"The persecution of a German Communist refugee not only leads to, but has for its main purpose, the crucifixion of every American not ready to knuckle down to toryism."

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I am informed also that last night Drew Pearson, not the Communist but the commonest liar in the world, spoke out for Lilienthal over the radio. Today someone in the CIO came out for him. So, Mr. President, Mr. Lilienthal's real strength in certain quarters is now showing itself.

I am told that last night Drew Pearson told his listeners to bombard their Senators with letters and telegrams urging them to vote for Mr. Lilienthal. I myself did not hear the broadcast, but I am told that that was said, and I suppose Senators on both sides are receiving telegrams along that line.

I thank the Senator from Colorado for yielding to me.

CONTINUATION OF WAR EXCISE TAX RATES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1030) to continue in effect certain war excise tax rates, and for other purposes.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that H. R. 1030 be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Excise Tax Act of 1947."

SEC. 2. Section 1650 of the Internal Revenue Code (war tax rates of certain miscellaneous taxes) is hereby amended by striking out "and ending on the first day of the month which begins 6 months or more after the date of the termination of hostilities in the present war."

SEC. 3. Sections 1654 (termination of retail tax on luggage, etc.) and 1655 (definition of "date of the termination of hostilities in the present war") of such Code are hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. Section 1659 of such Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1659. Definition of 'Rate Reduction Date.'

"For the purposes of this chapter the term 'rate reduction date' means such date as the Congress shall by law prescribe."

SEC. 5. Section 302 (b) (2) of the Revenue Act of 1943 (period applicable to increase of tax with respect to billiard and pool tables and bowling alleys) is hereby amended by striking out ", and continuing through June 30 next following the first day of the first month which begins 6 months or more after the date of the termination of hostilities in the present war (as defined in Chapter 9A of the Internal Revenue Code)."

SEC. 6. Section 309 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1943 (relating to draw-back on distilled spirits) is hereby amended by striking out "and ending on the first day of the first month which begins 6 months or more after the date of the termination of hostilities in the present war."

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill now under consideration, reported favorably upon it, without amendment, and unanimously. The purpose of the bill is to continue, without a definite termination date, the war excise-tax rates imposed by the Revenue Act of 1943. The war-tax rates under the present law, with the rates which will become effective when the war-tax rates terminate, are shown in a table, which I shall later ask to have printed in the RECORD.

They include admissions, permanent use or lease of boxes or seats; sales of tickets outside of box office; cabarets, roof gardens, and so forth; dues or membership fees; initiation fees; jewelry; furs; toilet preparations; distilled spirits; imported perfumes containing distilled spirits; still and sparkling wines; fermented malt liquors; billiard and pool tables and bowling alleys; electric-light bulbs and tubes; telephone, long-distance; domestic telegraph, cable, or radio dispatches; leased wires, and so forth; wire and equipment service; local telephone service; transportation of persons; seats, berths, and so forth; and luggage.

The war rates on these items will expire on June 30, 1947. This is due to the fact that under the present law the war-tax rates expire on the first day of the first month which begins 6 months or more after the termination of hostilities in the present war. The President proclaimed the termination of hostilities in the present war on December 31, 1946, so that the war-tax rates will expire on June 30, 1947.

The effect of the bill, according to the Treasury, will be to increase the receipts in the fiscal year 1948 by $1,130,000,000. In addition, the receipts for the fiscal year 1947 will be increased by $37,000,000, due to the effect on current consumption. In other words, it is calculated that the enactment of this law will stimulate the now lagging business on the items affected by the bill and result in an increase in revenue in the current fiscal year of $37,000,000.

The receipts for the fiscal year 1949 will be increased by approximately $100,000,000, due to the lag of receipts behind liability to pay. In other words, these taxes run on a month-to-month basis, and the taxes due in the last month of the fiscal year 1948 will lap over for collection into the first month of the fiscal year 1949. These figures do not include the increase in postal receipts, which would result from a restoration of the postal rates affected by the President's proclamation, which for the fiscal year 1948 would amount to approximately $65,000,000. That, I may interject at this point, will, I anticipate, be taken care of by separate legislation.

I shall now give a brief explanation of the bill, section by section.

Section 1 of the bill merely provides that the act may be cited as the Excise Tax Act of 1947.

Section 2 would continue without a definite termination date the war-tax rates on admissions, cabarets, membership fees or dues, jewelry, furs, toilet preparations, and the other items which I have mentioned.

The exact war-tax rates and the previous rates have been set forth in a table to which I have referred and which I shall put in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Section 3 in similar fashion continues the retailer's excise tax of 20 percent on luggage, brief cases, toilet cases, purses, billfolds, and so forth, which otherwise would be replaced after June 30, 1947, by the former manufacturer's excise tax of 10 percent on luggage and toilet cases. This section 3 also eliminates the definition of the term "date of termination of hostilities in the present war," which no longer would have any application to the war-excise taxes.

Section 4 is a technical amendment necessary to retain in the internal revenue code the present provisions for the mechanics for making floor stocks refunds on war-tax rates on distilled spirits, wines, and beer, and electric-light bulbs held by retailers and wholesalers, if, and when, such war-tax rates on these items are repealed.

Also retained is the technical provision for reduction of the war-tax rates on communications on a bill-rendered basis, if and when such rates are eliminated.

Section 5 is another technical amendment necessary in connection with the indefinite continuance of the war-tax rates on billiard and pool tables and bowling alleys.

Section 6 is a technical amendment which would continue indefinitely the present rate of draw-back on distilled spirits used in the manufacture of certain nonbeverage products, mainly, medicinal, at the rate of $6 per gallon, which is necessary in view of the continuance of the war-tax rates on distilled spirits upon which such $6 drawback is based.

A number of reasons suggest themselves why this bill should be passed promptly in its present form. Immediately after the President's proclamation ending hostilities, a sizable buyer's strike developed on the items which I have mentioned. Of course, the customer figured that he would refrain from buying, and pick up the same articles after June 30 without the additional war taxes. As a result a very substantial segment of our economy has been injured, and many complaints have come to the Congress. I suppose every Senator has received such complaints.

Another reason for the prompt passage of this bill is so that we may bring these items into line with others which have no termination date.

It should be understood that the items with which we are concerned here are only a small part of the whole field of items affected by excise taxes. For example, we imposed new taxes during the war, which are unaffected by the President's proclamation, in other words, which have indefinite termination dates, affecting transportation of property, business, and store machines, coin-operated machines, electric, gas, and oil appliances, matches, musical instruments, photographic apparatus, photographic films and plates, refrigerating equipment, sporting goods, stamp taxes. Then there is a large number of excise items for which provision was made prior to the war where the rates were increased during the war, which also are not affected by the Presidential proclamation terminating hostilities. I mention, for example, cigarettes, cigars, some of the distilled spirits, documentary taxes, taxes on insurance policies, taxes on the issue of bonds, capital-stock transfer taxes, playing cards, automobile taxes, taxes on automobile bodies, and the chassis, motorcycles, tires, and tubes, inner tubes, electric energy, firearms, gasoline and motor fuels, lubricating oils, matches, radios and radio accessories, and other items. They produce the bulk of the excise-tax revenues.

It seems to me perfectly apparent that if we are to proceed in orderly fashion we should put all of our excise taxes on an indefinite-term basis, unaffected by the President's proclamation ending hostilities, so that when the time comes—and I hope it will come in the reasonably near future—we can give over-all consideration to the whole field of such taxes without embarrassment by nonuniform termination dates.

Another reason which suggests itself as to why the bill should be passed promptly is the action taken by the Joint Congressional Budget Committee last Friday. That committee in arriving at its figures includes in its report, a copy of which will come before this body in a few days, the following:

> The committee finds that the estimated over-all receipts, assuming enactment of legislation with respect to excise taxes and postal revenues, will be $39,100,000,000, compared with the budget estimate of $38,900,000,000.

Therefore, as the Senate will appreciate, the maintenance of these taxes is an integral part of our budget estimates. Let me add that there was no objection by anyone to that part of the budget report. I emphasize again that we are talking about the maintenance of revenue amounting to about $1,200,000,000.

If we fool with these taxes we either have to dig deeper into the cuts which we may make, whether it be $3,000,000,000, $4,150,000,000, whether it be four and a half billion dollars, whether it be six billion dollars, or whether it be some intermediate figure, or we have to transfer this burden to some other excise taxes or to some other form of existing taxes.

I urge, therefore, the Senate to proceed with expedition to pass the bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point a number of tables bearing on the subject of excise taxes.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The above loss in revenue is figured as the actual loss for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948.
Because of some lag in collections, this does not reflect the entire loss on account of the proclamation.
It is also believed that some additional loss will be incurred for the fiscal year 1947, due to purchases being held up prior to July 1, 1947.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the proper place in the bill it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. Section 3412 (c) (2) of the Internal Revenue Code, as amended (relating to tax on gasoline), is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: "or any product having an initial boiling point of more than 200° F. and having an end point of more than 480° F."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, while this amendment may appear somewhat complicated, it can be explained in a very few words. It does not affect in the least the tax income. The law now provides tax exemption for so-called tractor fuel, fuel for agricultural implements used by farmers in their work. The regulations of the Department at the moment provide that the tax shall be collected and then rebated. This amendment simply provides that the tax shall not be collected in the first place. I have attempted to have such provision made in bills which were heretofore considered by the Senate, but I have yielded to the request that I wait until a regular tax bill came before us. I think this is the appropriate occasion for such an amendment, if the chairman of the Committee on Finance is willing to have it considered at this time.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I urge the distinguished Senator not to press his amendment. It seems very clear that one of these days—and as soon as possible—we shall have to make an over-all review of the entire system of excise taxes. At that time it will be appropriate for the Senator's amendment to be considered. At this time, inasmuch as we are dealing with only a small segment of the whole subject, and since it seems to me that his amendment is more appropriate in connection with over-all consideration of the subject, I hope he will not press the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I want to be cooperative. In view of the fact that this amendment does not in any way affect the tax income of the Government, I am hoping that I may have the assurance that the committee will give the proposed amendment serious consideration when the next tax bill involving a general revision comes before the Senate.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I can assure the Senator that whenever we come to the general revision of excise taxes his amendment, if then offered, will receive most careful consideration.

Mr. BUTLER. Under the circumstances I think I should withdraw the proposed amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator withdraws his amendment.

Are there further amendments?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated. It directly affects the bill under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. (a) Section 1650 of the Internal Revenue Code, as amended, is amended by striking out, in the table contained in such section, the matter relating to admissions.

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect on the 15th day following the date of enactment of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BUTLER. The proposed amendment very definitely affects the tax income. If Senators will refer to the committee report on the pending bill, and to the table on page 1, they will find that the first item is "Admissions." The war-tax rate is 1 cent for each 5 cents or major fraction thereof. The old rate was 1 cent for each 10 cents or fraction thereof. The proposed amendment would cancel the wartime rate and leave in effect the rate which was in effect before the wartime rate was adopted. I think it is only fair, in view of the situation, that the tax on admissions should be reduced to the rate which formerly prevailed, which was exactly one-half the present wartime rate.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, the Senator's amendment would deprive the Treasury of more than $140,000,000 of revenue. It is a very substantial item. It goes to the whole theory of excise taxes. It covers a species of tax which it seems to me is peculiarly appropriate for consideration when we come to a general review of the whole subject.

The budget which has been decided upon by the Budget Committee, and which will be before us in a few days, contemplates the maintenance of the excise taxes which are affected by the pending bill. I believe that it would be a bad mistake to separate one item which would cause a loss of more than $140,000,000. I can assure the Senator again that when we come to the revision of the excise taxes this will certainly be an item which will receive the most careful consideration. Personally, I shall give the most careful and sympathetic attention to legislation designed at least to ameliorate the rigor of the present taxes. In view of the large amount of money involved, I hope the Senator will not press his amendment at this time.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I might readily agree that in view of the fact that very shortly we are to have before us the general consideration of the budget bill, as well as over-all tax proposals, there is sufficient ground for postponing a vote on this amendment at this time. However, I prefer to leave it in this way, if it is agreeable to the Senator in charge of the bill. I think there is an amendment somewhat similar to this one, proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE]. Because of the possibility that he may want a vote on that particular item, and because in effect his amendment is the same as mine, I shall not call for a vote at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw his amendment?

Mr. BUTLER. May it be left pending, to be acted upon after the other amendments have been disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot make such disposition of the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, I withdraw the amendment for the time being.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE] the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE], the Senator from Utah [Mr. WATKINS], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], and myself I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 1. (a) Section 2401 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to the tax on furs) is amended by striking out the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"There is hereby imposed upon the following articles sold at retail a tax equivalent to 10 percent of the price for which so sold: Articles made of fur on the hide or pelt, and articles of which such fur is a component material the value of which is greater than three times the value of the component material of chief value without regard to such fur."

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect on the first day of the first month which begins more than 20 days after the date of the enactment of this act.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, several Senators, including myself, submitted an amendment similar to this one. I understand from the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY] that the language of the new amendment is acceptable to the Bureau of Internal Revenue or to the Treasury Department. Because of that fact I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin to explain why the amendment is offered in this language rather than the language of the other amendment.

Mr. MCCARTHY. Mr. President, the amendment itself is not acceptable to the Treasury Department. It has suggested, however, that the wording of the pending amendment be adopted in place of the original amendment. It does not change the effect of that amendment. The original amendment read as follows:

SEC. 7. (a) Section 2401 of the Internal Revenue Code, as amended (relating to tax on furs), is hereby amended by inserting after the first sentence in such section a new sentence as follows: "The tax imposed by this section shall not apply with respect to cloth garments trimmed with fur wherein the value of the fur set does not exceed 75 percent of the combined value of the fur set and the cloth shell."

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect on the fifteenth day following the date of enactment of this act.

The Treasury Department has suggested that we use the wording of the amendment which has been offered. In presenting and supporting this amendment I wish to make it clear first, that it has nothing to do with raising, lowering, extending, or terminating the war excise tax rates as passed by the Congress in 1943. Second, it does not involve the question of what is or what is not a luxury item, or whether our economic conditions justify the continuation of war excise taxes. Third, it in no way concerns or affects any other articles covered by excise taxes, nor does it establish a precedent for further amendment to the bill.

In 1941 there was a tax imposed upon furs and upon so-called fur-trimmed cloth garments. The wording of that provision was as follows:

There is hereby imposed upon the following articles sold at retail, a tax equivalent to 10 percent of the price of: Articles made of fur on the hide or pelt, and articles of which such fur is the component material of chief value.

The Treasury Department has interpreted that act in this fashion: It has taken the value, not of the fur, but of the completed fur set; that is, the fur set as it comes from the manufacturer to the man who puts the cloth and the fur together. So there is included the cost of the fur, the cost of the labor involved, and the profit along the line. They have not compared the cost of the fur set with that of all the other articles that enter into the make-up of the garment. They have disregarded the silk lining, the pockets, the buttons, and all the other findings in the garment, but they compare the fur set to the cost of the cloth shell. The effect of this interpretation has been not to produce revenue, but rather to act as a complete prohibition against the use of certain pelts on cloth coats. The fox farmers, mink farmers, and muskrat farmers have been completely deprived of a huge section of their market.

I have gone over this matter in detail with Treasury Department representatives, and one of the objections which they have to the bill is that they feel it will create unfair discrimination against cheap fur coats. Now, there are only two types of furs that I know of which sell under the price range roughly of $150. At present a fur-trimmed garment selling for less than $100 is exempt. Incidentally, if this amendment is adopted it will raise that figure to approximately $142–$150. The only full-fur coats that come below the price of $142 are mouton and coney, the latter being rabbit from Australia.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The Senator has been discussing fur-trimmed garments, has he not?

Mr. McCARTHY. I have.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I do not have any figures, but I have been told that the tax attaches to fur coats made completely of fur regardless of the price at which the coats are sold. Does the Senator know about that?

Mr. McCARTHY. There is a 20 percent tax on all-fur coats.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. What justification is there for putting a tax on a fur coat that sells for $75 and not putting a tax on a whole cloth coat that sells for $75?

Mr. McCARTHY. For this reason: One of the two fur coats that sells below $150 is mouton. Apparently the representatives of the Treasury Department think that there is such an animal as a mouton.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I should like to be advised what it is.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is sheep wool. At the present time we are subsidizing wool, paying a subsidy of 20 cents a pound, while we at the same time tax mouton, or, in other words, sheepskin.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I am not prepared to debate this question, but I have been told that probably 60 or 70 percent of the fur coats sold in this country are sold at prices around $100, $110, $115, or less.

Mr. McCARTHY. No; that is not correct.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I have seen some rather impressive figures. I do not have them before me. The argument was made that such coats are in direct competition with cloth coats which sell for as high a price as $175 or $200, and that the tax on the fur coat that sells at a lower price is a luxury tax, a completely unfair business tax as compared with the tax on the cloth coat. I should like to have the Senator discuss that point if he is prepared to do so.

Mr. McCARTHY. We have made a very complete survey of this subject and have found that the only fur coats that sell in substantial quantities below $142, below which this amendment would allow an exemption, are mouton and coney. The only reason why I have brought this amendment before the Senate is that our fur farmers, who constitute a very important segment of agriculture, cannot exist unless the amendment is adopted at this time. I say "at this time" because the manufacture of fur-trimmed garments is seasonal. The manufacturers are now manufacturing cloth coats for sale next fall; and unless we remove this prohibition of the use of fur trim on cloth coats—and under the Treasury Department's interpretation of the revenue act there is a prohibition—it will force practically all our fur farmers into bankruptcy, which is what is happening to many of them now.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I am not hostile to the amendment the Senator proposes, but I fail to see the justice of attempting to give relief in this situation when we still keep the luxury taxes on fur coats which sell in direct price-range competition with cloth coats. I do not know why the tax is not removed from the cheaper fur coats, which, after all, are used to keep people warm and are entirely necessary articles of clothing. It seems to me that the excise taxes should be removed from cheaper fur coats at the same time that such taxes are removed from fur-trimmed cloth coats which are in direct competition with them.

Mr. McCARTHY. The only reason why I have not gone into the question of cheaper fur coats is that there are only two types of fur coats which are in the price range of the cloth coats with fur trim which we are now discussing. One of them is the so-called mouton coat, which never should have been taxed in the first place, if the Department had properly interpreted the act, for such coats are not really fur coats at all, but are wool coats. In its interpretation of the revenue act under which fur-trimmed coats were taxed the Treasury Department should have so determined. After all, wool is not fur. That would remove such coats from classification as "fur coats" for tax purposes.

The only other fur coats which come within this price range are coats made of Australian rabbit.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. So, in reality, instead of causing a discrimination, the amendment will eliminate a discrimination, because if the amendment is adopted it will be possible for the manufacturers to use fur trim on cloth coats without incurring liability for such excise taxes. In other words, the use of fur trim will not then penalize cloth coats. Is that not so?

Mr. McCARTHY. That is true.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Nevertheless, fur coats which are in the same competitive price range with fur-trimmed cloth coats will be penalized.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin has pointed out that there are only two types of such fur coats.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes; there are only two sold in any appreciable amount. One is mouton, which is not fur at all, but is wool.

Mr. WHERRY. And if the Treasury Department handles this matter as it was intended to be handled, that will eliminate mouton coats from the fur-coat class.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. The only other class is composed of coats made of Australian rabbit. That is true, is it not?

Mr. McCARTHY. That is entirely true.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I suppose we could pick up any Washington newspaper and find in it advertisements of fur coats—so-called, at least. I do not know what names are used in advertising such coats; but the newspapers are full of large advertisements of "fur coats," many of them advertised for sale at less than $100. At any rate, they are described in the advertisements as fur coats. Yet I assume that the act requires the imposition of a 20-percent tax or a similar tax as a luxury tax on such coats. In my own mind I simply cannot justify the continuation of such an excise tax, a luxury tax, on a coat selling for perhaps $90, which happens to be fur, and which the wearer uses to keep himself warm and to protect himself from the wind, whereas a fur-trimmed cloth coat which sells for $90 or $95 is free from tax. I cannot justify that situation in my own mind.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, apparently I did not make myself clear. My point is that we should accomplish the purpose which the Senate apparently intended to accomplish when it passed the act in 1943.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I understand that, and I understand that the Senator's amendment relates only to fur-trimmed cloth coats. However, I am simply raising the question. I shall not pursue it further.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Let me say that during the last war there was an attempt to levy excise taxes on clothing, for instance, shoes and other articles, on the basis of cost. The Treasury Department absolutely objected to such a classification, saying it was opposed to it and could not enforce it, although it seemed to be more logical than any other system. The Treasury Department said it did not want to have a classification based on value, whether retail value or wholesale value. So instead of such a classification, the tax is based on fur. The question is whether a coat is all fur or part fur. If a coat contains more fur than cloth, then it is taxable.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER How will the Treasury Department meet the burden with respect to making such a differentiation?

Mr. TAFT. I do not know; but the Treasury says it can do it and has done it and has been administering the law that way for the past 5 years, and it says it wishes to continue to use that method. The Treasury does not question the use of the percentage system which distinguishes a fur coat from a fur-trimmed cloth coat which is not regarded as a fur coat. The percentage method is the method of differentiation.

It seems to me that at this late date we should not propose a change in the method. I understand that one result of the present method is practically to bar the sale of fur-trimmed coats. The sale of such coats has been cut down to approximately one-third of what it was previously, because of the formula which has been applied by the Treasury. I am not sure whether a change in the formula would cause a decrease in net taxes.

In any event, it seems to me that the adoption of the method proposed will not violate any principle, if there is any principle in respect to excise taxes. As a matter of fact, there is none; and I look forward to the day when we shall eliminate two-thirds of the present excise-tax structure, because such taxes are most illogical and are discriminatory, and sooner or later we should get rid of them. But at the present moment, I think we must continue them, in view of the present budgetary situation.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCARTHY I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. I should like to ask the Senator whether his amendment applies to all coats lined with fur, in which the value of the fur exceeds 75 percent of the total cost of the garment.

Mr. McCARTHY. First, let me correct one point. My amendment does not refer to the value of the entire garment. The Treasury Department has been using a work sheet which compares only the cost of the cloth shell to the cost of the fur set. The cloth shell ordinarily is composed of approximately two and one-half or three yards of cloth. At approximately $4 a yard, which is a high-class cloth, the cloth shell amounts to approximately $12. The labor of putting that cloth shell together amounts to another $8, more or less—in other words, a $20 cloth shell, when assembled. A shell made of such cloth would be used for a high-class fur-trimmed coat.

So the Treasury's interpretation leaves out of consideration the silk lining, the pockets, the buttons, the beads, the labor, and everything else that goes into the production of the coat, other than the fur. The cost of the fur itself is not considered, but consideration is given to the cost of the completed fur set as it is delivered to the manufacturer of cloth coats; and that cost is compared to the cost of the cloth coat shell. I cannot conceive of any reason why that method of computation has been adopted.

Our original thought was to try to clarify the situation in the following manner: We would force the Treasury Department to adopt the interpretation which we think was intended to be adopted when the law was enacted, and make the Treasury compare the cost of the fur at the manufacturer's level with the cost of everything else that goes into the manufacture of such coats—in other words, the cloth shell, the lining, the pockets, and everything else. We took that up with the Treasury Department.

Mr. OVERTON. I understand, but that does not quite answer the question.

Mr. McCARTHY. Let me proceed. I shall endeavor to make the point clear for the Senator. The Treasury Department told us if that were done the cost of administration would be so great that it would offset the additional income they would get from the tax on fur-trimmed coats.

Mr. OVERTON. I notice the amendment provides:

> Articles made of fur on the hide or pelt, and articles of which such fur is a component material the value of which is greater than three times the value of the component material of chief value without regard to such fur.

If such a coat retailed for $2,000, it would not be taxable.

Mr. McCARTHY. Such a coat never will retail for $2,000.

Mr. OVERTON. Why not?

Mr. McCARTHY. For the reason that about the highest priced cloth obtainable costs, roughly, $4 a yard. It takes about three yards of cloth to make the cloth shell. That makes $12. The cost of the manufacture is rather standard, about $8.

Mr. OVERTON. What is the highest price of cloth coats without any fur on them?

Mr. McCARTHY. That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. OVERTON. I know it has not, but I say, what is the highest retail price of cloth coats?

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not know.

Mr. OVERTON. What is the highest retail price of cloth coats trimmed with fur?

Mr. McCARTHY. We are concerned only with coats which run up to about $142, because this amendment will not exempt coats costing much beyond that figure.

Mr. OVERTON. That is not stipulated in the amendment.

Mr. McCARTHY. Considering the manufacturer's method of making the coats, from all information we have from the Department of Agriculture and from the Census Bureau, that definitely appears to be the fact.

Mr. OVERTON. The Senator's statement is that this amendment then applies only to coats which retail at $142 and under?

Mr. McCARTHY. One department says $142; the other says $150. It is somewhere within that price range. If the price of cloth increases or decreases there may be a variance; but at the present cost of the cloth, it will run about $142.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I should like to say to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin that I am not at all convinced that this amendment if adopted would put any drain upon our revenues. We are seeking additional facts in the matter. I am perfectly willing to take the amendment to conference, with reservations as to its possible fate there.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, for the past 3 weeks I have been endeavoring to obtain some assistance from the Treasury Department in sponsoring an amendment to the pending bill which would exempt from the 20 percent tax all fur coats wherein the value of the fur in each coat would not exceed 50 percent of the manufacturer's selling price. I have taken the matter up with several members of the Committee on Finance, and because, I presume, of the fact that the Treasury Department was not favorable to such an amendment, no effort has been made by the committee to report such an amendment to the Senate. On the other hand the argument was made by some members of the committee that if we opened the door in aid of fur dealers no just excuse could be offered not to assist those demanding relief from excise taxes on telephone and telegraph services and other commodities. I can well appreciate their position.

This morning I reluctantly agreed to sponsor the amendment which is now being proposed. That amendment will do very little for the fur industry as a whole. As the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin has said, it will affect only the tax on coats made from cloth, but which are trimmed with fur. It will afford an outlet for some of the large raw fur stocks that are now clogging the warehouses of the country. I decided to go along with the amendment in the hope of affording some measure of relief, no matter how slight.

Mr. President, I am very anxious that the Senate will in the near future enact a measure exempting from all excise taxes fur coats, valued, say, at $250 to $300, from the 20-percent tax. In short, I am very hopeful that all fur coats made from the cheaper variety of furs will be exempted entirely from all excise taxes. Such furs as I have in mind would exempt coats made from mouton, referred to by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, also raccoon, rabbit, skunk, opossum, muskrat, squirrel, and the like.

Coats made from furs of that kind are not luxury items, but they are necessities. As I will demonstrate in a moment, the tax on a coat made from these cheaper varieties of furs is often greater than the entire cost of the raw fur that goes into the making of the coat. Is such a tax just? It amounts to confiscation, in my opinion. Such a high tax has demoralized the sale and distribution of fur coats to such an extent that many fur dealers and manufacturers of fur coats have been put out of business. Many have lost their life's savings.

On the other hand those who catch and ensnare the animals that produce these cheaper grades of furs have likewise lost heavily. Raw furs have piled up in the warehouses all over the country and the prices of this winter's catch have been extremely low. To give an example, muskrats sold for $1.70 per hide last year and today the trapper is selling at less than 75 cents per hide. Not only is the trapper obtaining less for the hides he catches, but his cost of operation has increased. His living costs have increased over 50 percent. Traps that cost from $3.50 to $4 per dozen now cost him from $8 to $15 per dozen. Rubber boots that cost $5 to $6 are now selling from $8 to $12. It can readily be seen that the hundreds of our citizens now engaged in that business cannot survive.

Mr. President, the fur in a mouton coat is of the value of about $12 to $15. The manufacturer's selling price, including the cost of dressing, dye, labor, finishing, overhead, and a reasonable profit is from $40 to $90. Add to that price the profit of the retail distributors and the consumer pays from $60 to $135 for the coat. Now, on top of that we must add the tax which ranges from $12 to $27. Why should a coat whose manufacturing cost is $90, with a retail price of $135 be taxed $27, when the cost of the fur ranges from $12 to $15? Can such a tax be justified? Why, Mr. President, the whole week's work of most of our Government employees is taken in order to pay the tax on a fur coat made from most of our cheaper varieties of furs. These coats, as I pointed out, are not luxuries, but necessities in most parts of the country.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. I should like to point out to the Senator that when a coat with a cloth shell worth $20 and a fur set worth $21 is made into a coat that retails for about $100, the Government would obtain a $20 tax on a $21 piece of fur, that is to say, 100 percent tax on the fur.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is exactly the point. The tax is not only placed on the fur itself, but on everything that goes into the garment. I say that it is really confiscatory. It is a 20-percent tax, as I have just pointed out, on the value of the entire garment, retailing for between about $90 and $100, to which $20 worth of fur has been added.

Mr. President, I repeat, such a tax cannot be justified. This tax, as I have stated, has caused a heavy blow to the fur industry all over the country, particularly to fur producers who deal in, catch, and ensnare the cheaper furs, such as muskrat, opossom, raccoon, squirrel, and the like.

In my own State about six and one-half or seven million muskrats are produced annually, constituting about 50 percent of the entire number of muskrats caught throughout the entire country. That means a heavy tax on the fur industry of my State. To illustrate, when muskrat is used to make a coat, the value of the fur alone ranges from $50 to $65. It means to the fur trappers of any State a tax of from $10 to $13 on each coat. On the coat as a whole, which generally retails for between $250 and $300 when the manufacturer's costs and the retailer's costs are added, the tax aggregates from $50 to $60, which represents the entire cost of the furs used in making the coat. Can such an unconscionable tax be justified? Mr. President I have before me a statement which illustrates the average cost to the manufacturer of fur for one coat made from various kinds of furs. I am certain it can be demonstrated that as to all fur coats made from our cheaper varieties of raw furs, the tax on the retail prices of the coats is as great ,if not greater, in many instances than the entire cost of the raw furs that are used to make up the coats.
